ECCLESIASTICAL ASSESSMENTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (Lord BALFOUR of BURLEIGH): My Lords, in rising to move the Second Reading of this Bill, which has already passed the House of Commons, I shall not detain your Lordships for many minutes. The Bill is designed for the removal of a grievance of old standing, one which is perfectly well known to noble Lords from Scotland, and if the House passes the Bill and it becomes law I believe that in practice it will effect its object. I do not propose to go into the history of ecclesiastical assessments in Scotland. I believe that history is perfectly familiar to noble Lords from Scotland who are interested in the question, and I am not sanguine enough to suppose that I should be able to interest noble Lords who do not belong to Scotland in a subject of this kind. The position of matters is this. The obligation to provide Church accommodation, a house for the Minister, and a burial ground for the parish has been for a great number of years a burden upon the land of the parish. If there is anything in the argument, of which we hear a good deal sometimes in other connections, that such and such a rate is an hereditary burden upon property, then this burden is one out of which the landowners in Scotland have no title to escape. So long as a parish remains purely rural in its character I think that even at the present time no one can make out that any grievance exists; but it is different when the character of a parish has changed from rural to urban, when a good deal of building has taken place, and when that system of allotting land for building, which in Scotland is known as feuing, has proceeded to any considerable extent. By a series of legal decisions, and by the operation of the Valuation Act, passed in 1854, two distinct systems of raising ecclesiastical assessments are now in practice. In rural parishes the assessment is, speaking generally, laid on what is known as the old valued-rent, and in parishes where much building has taken place very often the real rent has been substituted for this purpose for the old valued-rent. At the present time it is possible for any one valued-rent heritor to insist that the real rent shall be brought into practice. The object of this Bill is to provide that if at a meeting of valued-rent heritors a majority of two thirds in value of the valued-rent heritors prefer to retain the old system they shall be at liberty to do so, and, if not, then the parishes will be assessed for this purpose on the real rent. The main part of the Bill is contained in the clause which provides for the case of parishes in which the real rent either has been brought in in the past or will be brought in in the future. In those cases a grievance does press upon those heritors who are feuars and those of small amount, and the object of the Bill is to make legal a transaction which is very often carried into effect at the present time. It is proposed in this Bill to effect the exemption altogether of heritors under £50. But there is this condition attached, that the authorities of the Church in the parish shall be prepared to pay the amount which would have been raised from those exempted under this Bill. By this Bill the Church is not asking anything for herself but is only asking Parliament to permit her to relieve ratepayers from certain charges which are now levied upon them by legal sanction, but which are sometimes imposed under conditions which involve practical hardship. The Bill is only to make legal a method which is often at the present moment arrived at as a private compromise, but which in practice is liable to be obstructed by a small minority of individuals, for the purpose not of relieving themselves of the burden, but of making as much difficulty for the Church as possible.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

LORD TWEEDMOUTH: My Lords, I shall not detain the House for more than a few moments in referring to the statement the noble Lord has just made—the Bill is of too small a character to warrant me in doing so. In Scotland at this moment we have in full blast a system of supporting the Church by tithes and Church rates, both being charges upon the land. The Church rates are used, as the noble Lord has stated, for the building and repairing of churches and manses and the provision of burial grounds. These charges have always been willingly paid by the landowners, but a difficulty has arisen in collecting them from the smaller landowners in different parishes. To meet that grievance, surely one of two courses would have been proper—either the Church rates should have been abolished altogether and the duty of building and maintaining church fabrics and manses thrown upon the congregation attending them; or, if you are not ready to take so heroic a remedy as that, at any rate, to meet particular grievances you should have said that landowners below a certain valuation should not be charged at all. This Bill proposes to do neither of these two things. On the one hand it says that the larger landowners may hold a meeting of their own, and that if two-thirds, reckoned by valuation, of those landowners are in favour of relieving the smaller landowners altogether they may do so, and levy the amount on themselves, by which there is always a possibility of a certain number of the landowners in the parish having thrown upon them extra burdens to which they have not assented. This seems a doubtful way of dealing with the matter. On the other hand, it is proposed that, where the whole of the landowners in the parish are to be retained in the assessments, then, if the kirk session is willing, it may cause a certain amount to be struck off the valuation of all the landowners of the parish, providing the deficiency is made up by the kirk session. I have never heard of a kirk session being a body which had very much money to dispose of, and I should like to know where they are to get the money from with which to do this. I suppose they will have to rely upon voluntary contributions or bazaars. This is the first time I have heard a proposal in an Act of Parliament that rates should be assisted, with the sanction of Parliament, by voluntary contributions. I do not think the noble and learned Lord will say that I have misinterpreted the provisions of his Bill, which seems to me to be founded neither on good principle nor on courageous opinions. In practice it will be of little importance, for in many parishes the principle is already adopted by the consent of the landowners. I shall, therefore, content myself by saying not content when the question is put from the Woolsack.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2ª accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of SELBORNE): My Lords, I would especially invite your attention to the unique circumstances under which the movement for federation in Australia, which has ended in the Bill now before your Lordships for consideration, has had its origin, and brought its history, I hope, almost to the point of fulfilment. The Constitution of the United States of America was born of a struggle for national independence. The Constitution of the Dominion of Canada was accepted as the solution of internal political troubles constantly recurring over a course of many years, and sometimes acute. The consolidation of the German Empire was rendered possible by the victories of a great war. It has been reserved for the people and the statesmen of Australia alone to determine to federate out of what I may call pure reason. They, and they alone, have looked to the future, and, as custodians of the interest of their descendants, have determined to consolidate the colonies of Australia in one great commonwealth. The fact that this movement has existed and the work has been completed under no special pressure calls, I think, for a tribute of admiration from us, because it must have greatly added to the difficulties of the statesmen who had the task in hand. They had to reconcile six different States, each with divergent interests, each with its own separate local conditions and its own separate history, and in each of which had arisen the usual growth of vested interests; and to have completed the work of federation without any very great pressure is a most remarkable performance, and one that will place the statesmen of Australia on a level with those statesmen who have been admired by the world for the Constitutions they gave to America and the Dominion of Canada. I would ask you, my Lords, before you read this Bill a second time, to take note of some very remarkable features in the Constitution embodied in the Bill. First of all, there are the provisions for a change in the Constitution in the future, if necessary. Any law for altering this Constitution must be passed by an absolute majority of each House of Parliament, that is, the Senate and House of Representatives. When so passed it must be submitted to the vote of the electors in each State who are qualified to vote for the election of members in the House of Representatives. If in a majority of the States a majority of the electors who vote are in favour of the proposed law, and if a majority of all the electors voting in all the States are also in favour of the proposed law, it passes, and must then be presented to the Governor General for the Queen's assent. I think I ought to assure my noble and learned friend Lord James of Hereford, that in those colonies where there is womanhood suffrage as well as manhood suffrage, only half the number of votes are allowed to count. I would ask your Lordships to observe that no proposed alteration of the Constitution the object of which is, either (1) to diminish the proportionate representation of any State in the Senate or House of Representatives, or (2) to diminish the minimum number of representatives, or (3) to alter in any way the limits of a State, or (4) to affect the provisions of the Constitution in relation to any particular State, may become law unless it is approved by the majority of the electors voting in the State which will be affected by the proposed alteration. I would ask you to compare those provisions for a change of the Constitution with the provisions that obtain in the United States of America. You will notice that in the case of the Commonwealth of Australia a proposed change must not only be passed by a majority of the people in a majority of the States, but also by a total majority of those voting in all the States on the question. In the Constitution of the United States there are two methods of effecting a change of the Constitution, but I will only mention one which, I believe, has been invariably used in all the changes of the Constitution which have taken place. Congress, i.e., the Senate and the House of Representatives, may, by a two-thirds vote in each House, prepare and propose Amendments. Those Amendments, when so prepared and proposed by Congress, must then be submitted to the Legislatures of the States, and they are only passed if the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States ratify them. I think your Lordships will see that in one point, at any rate, these two processes are likely to have the same effect. In neither case is it probable that any Amendment of the Constitution can be made to which a majority of the people are opposed. If you come to consider the converse proposition, whether it is possible or likely that a change in the Constitution, which the majority of the people really desire, may not be effected owing to the process which the Constitution enjoins, then I must say I think the advantage lies with the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia. It is obviously more difficult to make a change in the Constitution of the United States than it would be in the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Australia. The only comment I would make upon that is that it seems to me that the proposals in the Commonwealth Bill are more truly democratic than those of the United States. I use that term with its ordinary grammatical meaning and without any attribution of merit or demerit Under this Bill the final arbiters on a question of a change of the Constitution are the people — the voters. The next provision to which I would call your Lordships' especial attention, one of very peculiar interest for this House, is the provision against a deadlock between the two Houses. Section 57 runs as follows—

"When the House of Representatives has passed a law which the Senate rejects or fails to pass, or amends in a way to which the House of Representatives will not agree, the House of Representatives may, if it wishes to force matters to a conclusion, again pass the law with or without any amendments emanating from the Senate, after an interval of three months. If the Senate again rejects it or omits to pass it, or amends it as above, the Governor-General may dissolve both Houses simultaneously, but such dissolution must not take place within six months of the natural date of dissolution of the House of Representatives."

I may say here, in passing, that the House of Representatives must be re-elected every three years, but the Senate as a body is never dissolved, except under the provision which I have just quoted. A member of the Senate is elected for six years. Half of the first Senate will be elected for only three years, and after that a half will be elected every three years. So you will see this is a very special provision for a dissolution of the whole Senate in the case of a deadlock. The section continues—

"If after dissolution the new House of Representatives again passes the law with or without any amendments emanating from the Senate, and the Senate again rejects it, or fails to pass it, or amends it as above, the Governor-General may convene a joint sitting of the members of both Houses. The joint sitting may deliberate together on the proposed law, and on any amendments as to which the two Houses have disagreed. After deliberation the next step is to vote on the law. This they must do together, and if the law itself, with or without Amendments, is carried by an absolute majority of the total number of members of the two Houses, the law as passed by the joint sitting will be regarded as duly passed by both Houses."

Your Lordships will observe that the terms all through are permissive and not obligatory. "The Governor-General may dissolve both Houses." That is, of course, the Governor-General acting on the advice of his Ministers. "The Governor-General may convene a joint sitting of the two Houses." He is not obliged to do so, but may do so on the advice of his Ministers. But when once this meeting of the two Houses is convened then the vote—the final vote—must be given by the two Houses sitting as one House, though the deliberations which take place previous to the vote may, if they like, in each case be separate. There is a variation to which I would draw your Lordships' attention in those cases where the disagreement is as to a change in the Constitution. In the case of an ordinary disagreement this process is only applicable if the Bill on which the dispute has occurred has emanated from the House of Representatives. There is no corresponding privilege to the Senate in the case of a Bill which has emanated from the Senate. But if the Bill as to which disagreement exists is a Bill proposing a change in the Constitution, then the same privilege obtains in the case of both Houses. My Lords, the observations that I would make to you as regards this process are two-fold. In the first place, I believe it is the very first time that in an Anglo-Saxon Constitution any attempt has been made to provide for a solution of a deadlock between the two Houses. There is no such provision in the Constitution of the United States of America; there is no such provision in the Constitution of the Dominion of Canada. The second observation I would make is that the plan in this Bill has this merit: that it goes to the root of the whole matter and refers the final decision to the electorate—it does not leave the decision to one of the two Houses which are parties to the dispute. Therefore, whatever decision is arrived at is one that must be accepted as final and conclusive by all parties. I would briefly point out to your Lordships the provisions for the election of the two Houses. The Senate is devised specially as a representative Chamber of the States as States. Each original State has six

The Earl of Selborne.

Senators, no matter what its area or population may be. The electors for the Senate are the same as those for the House of Representatives, and in the absence of any provision to be made by Parliament in the future the electors vote in each State as one electorate. The election, as I have already mentioned, is for six years. In the case of the Senators first elected, half of them are chosen by lot to go out at the end of three years. The House of Representatives is to have a total number of Members which is to be double the total of the Members of the Senate, and which are to be allotted to each State in proportion to their respective populations. The States are to be divided into constituencies for the purpose of this election by their own State Parliaments if they wish. In default of such legislation the electors will vote as one electorate. The electorate for the Commonwealth Parliament is in each State to be the same as the electorate for its own Chamber. And here I must commiserate with my noble and learned friend whom I congratulated just now, on the fact that the rights of women voters in those States where womanhood suffrage prevails are carefully guarded by Section 41 of the Bill. The election of the House of Representatives is to be triennial, and each member is to get a remuneration of £400 per annum. No man can sit in both Houses. The feature of this Constitution which seems to me to most differentiate it from the American Constitution is that throughout it strictly follows the English plan of uniting the Legislature to the Executive, and in taking care that the Government of the day is armed with the full authority of the people who elect the majority in the Chamber. Your Lordships will appreciate the reason why I lay stress upon that if I remind you what the condition of affairs is under the Constitution of the United States of America. There the President is elected once in every four years. The House of Representatives is elected once in every two years, and one-third of the Senate is elected every two years. The result is that, although all authority in the United States necessarily and exclusively emanates from the people, yet it never so emanates at one moment. The will of the people of to-day is constantly influenced by the will of the people of yesterday and to-morrow. That is not our English plan, and the Constitution of Australia strictly follows the English plan. There can be no doubt that under it the Government of the Commonwealth of the day will represent the opinion of the Australian people at the moment of the last election. Of course, one of the most difficult class of questions that meets the framers of a Constitution like this is the principle on which the separation of power between the Federal Parliament and the local or State Parliaments is to be devised. The principle of this Bill is very simple. Section 52 defines the very few subjects in respect to which the Commonwealth Parliament is to have exclusive authority. There is a catalogue in Section 51 of the subjects with which the Federal Parliament may deal concurrently with the State Parliaments. The only powers, in fact, in matters of legislation which are taken away from the State Parliaments are those referred to in Section 52. The Commonwealth Parliament may extend its legislative horizon and deal with other matters if referred to it by the State Parliaments, and these provisions give that general character of elasticity to the Constitution which, I think, is its most prominent feature. The framers have made a deliberate choice between what I will call the rigidity of the American Constitution and the flexibility of the English Constitution, and although not able to allow that flexibility which has been of such great advantage in this country, yet the Constitution is framed on lines of flexibility rather than on lines of rigidity, and I do not think that any of your Lordships will doubt that in making this choice the framers of the Bill have followed a true instinct of the British race. It is in strict accordance with the political instincts of our race that our machinery should be of such a kind that it can be changed and developed as the times and conditions alter, and that we should not now attempt to stereotype a particular machinery which our descendants may not be able to change or alter, however much the condition of the country required it. There is one subject which I have not yet touched upon. I have referred to these matters because their importance has been rather obscured in the other House of Parliament by the attention which has been devoted to Clause 74. That is the clause, as your Lordships are well aware, which deals with the question of appeal to the Privy Council. Considerable controversies have centred upon that clause—controversies which your Lordships on both sides of the House will be glad have ended so happily. What I wish to explain briefly is the exact position of the matter as it has been left by, I will not say the compromise, but by the solution arrived at with the consent of all parties. The position of the Dominion of Canada with respect to appeals to the Privy Council has been generally adopted as a model for our admiration. Now, in what respect will the right of appeal in Australia differ from the right of appeal in Canada? In Canada an appeal may be taken by a litigant from one of the inferior courts direct to the Supreme Court of Canada, or to the Privy Council. Under this Bill an Australian litigant will have the same privilege. In Canada, if a litigant has chosen to go to the Supreme Court of Canada, he may appeal from the decision of that court to the Privy Council with and by leave of the Privy Council. In Australia a litigant will have the same privilege, except in one special class of cases where the question which has arisen is the limits inter se of the powers of any State, qua the Commonwealth, or of one State qua another State. In those cases litigants may still have the liberty of appeal to the Privy Council from the High Court of Australia, only the leave for that appeal is to be given not by the Privy Council, but by the High Court from which the appeal is to be carried. That is a very slight variation. It has been contended, I know, that its effect in questions involving constitutional issues is to make the High Court of Australia a co-ordinate court with the Privy Council. I speak with great diffidence in the presence of legal authorities, being no legal authority myself, but I understand that there is a strict precedent in the law of this country. At the present moment there are appeals in questions of bankruptcy from the Divisional Court to the Court of Appeal; and it is not the Court of Appeal but the Divisional Court which gives the leave to appeal, and no one will argue that the power of the Divisional Court to give leave to appeal constitutes it ipso facto a co-ordinate authority with the court to which it gives leave to appeal. If any doubt should remain in any of your Lordships' minds as to whether this settlement has obtained the full concurrence of the Australian colonies and people, perhaps you will allow me to read a few communications which have reached us since such communications as we had received had been laid before Parliament. The present Agent General of Victoria, Sir Andrew Clarke, writes under date 21st June—

"I have pleasure in communicating to you the following telegram, which I have received from my Government: 'Commonwealth Bill. Inform Secretary of State for Colonies Victoria approves Clause as now altered, and hopes speedy passage of Bill. Thank Secretary of State for Colonies for great trouble, kindly interest, and congratulate him on successful settlement.'"

Earl Beauchamp telegraphs from Sydney—

"Resolution passed by Legislative Assembly preferring Clause 74 in Bill as submitted by Australian Colonies, but, failing that, desiring compromise mentioned in your telegram of 16th instant. Telegram sent to New South Wales delegate late last night asking him to convey decision to you."

Lord Tennyson telegraphs from South Australia—

"Cabinet Ministers cordially acknowledge your continued efforts and of Imperial Government to reconcile what appeared to be to them the conflicting interests of Australia and Empire in connection with appeal clauses of Commonwealth Bill, and rejoice at prospect of early accomplishment of Federal union."

Viscount Gormanston telegraphs from Tasmania—

"Referring to your telegram of 21st June Ministers request me to send you following message:—'Begins: They desire to express gratification that whilst safeguarding British interests you have given to Australian colonies wider scope for the development of national life, and to express gratitude for patience and tact exercised by you throughout the conduct of deliberations and negotiations.'"

Lord Lamington sends the following telegram from Queensland—

"On behalf of my Ministers and myself I desire to offer you my hearty congratulations on the successful manner in which you have overcome the difficulties arising out of earlier proposals for amendment of Clause 74, Commonwealth Bill, and to express appreciation of satisfactory nature of the compromise in the clause as now passed."

The result of those communications is to show that while the Governments referred to would have preferred Clause 74 as brought from Australia to this country, yet they accept the arrangement proposed, and I think it is not unfair to say that all the other colonies concerned are completely satisfied with the clause as now framed, including those who were supposed to be most strongly in favour of the original form of Clause 74. I believe the solution arrived at is one which not only commends itself to the Australian people, but one which will be found to work well in practice; and I will only conclude by asking your Lordships to read the Bill a second time, and to join with me in offering the heartiest congratulations of this House to the Statesmen and the people of Australia.

Moved, "That the Bill now be read a second time."—(The Earl of Selborne).

EARL CARRINGTON: My Lords, the House has listened, with the attention that it deserves, to the very clever, remarkable, and interesting speech which has just been made by the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies. It was an interesting speech, because, for the first time, we have some idea of what the real intentions of Her Majesty's Government have been in regard to this measure, which, up to the present time, have been both confused and confusing; it was remarkable for its omissions as well as for the paucity of its admissions; and it was extraordinary for the cleverness with which the noble Earl skated over the thinnest of ice, threw difficulties behind him as if they never existed, and almost made the House believe that there had never been any crisis on this question at all. Indeed, so dexterous was his way of dealing with the subject, that while he was speaking I could not help thinking that I was in one of the Parliament Houses at Cape Town, where, as your Lordships know, the custom is that the same Minister can bring in a Bill in both Houses, though he can only vote in one. The noble Earl's work was so skilfully done that I thought the same skilful hand that piloted the Bill through the other House was now starting it on its passage through your Lordships' House. Verily, though the voice was the voice of Jacob, the hand was the hand of the well-known and astute political Esau. The noble Earl did not say one single word as to the manner in which this great question originated, and I hope your Lordships will bear with me for a few minutes while I refer to it. The Federation of Australia first came within the range of practical politics in the month of October, 1889, when Sir Henry Parkes, to the great amazement of the colonies, and without having said a word to the Cabinet, made a great speech in which he said that the time had come for the federation of the Australian colonies. The idea ran like wildfire all over the great Continent of Australia, and in the early part of the following year, 1890, in spite of the difficulties of the Federal Council—which, as your Lordships will remember, was a Council of the different States of Australia, with the exception of the Free Trade State of New South Wales—which were eventually got over—a Convention was held, I think, at Melbourne, at which Lord Hopetoun, who for five years was the representative of the Queen in the great colony of Victoria, made his first appearance in public. The toast of "United Australia" was responded to by Sir Henry Parkes, who made a speech worthy of the man and of the occasion. I need not weary your Lordships by mentioning the difficulties that arose. There were the Free Trade and Protection difficulty, the military difficulty, and, of course, there was the great question as to whether the capital was to be Melbourne or Sydney. There were many disappointments and many delays, but all these difficulties were successfully overcome, and at the end of last year a Bill was piloted through all the different Houses of Parliament, and submitted to a referendum of the Australian Colonies, and carried by a majority of nearly three to one. I want the House to remember—it was a point carefully omitted by the noble Earl—that during the whole of the ten years over which those negotiations extended, the British Government, who were kept well informed of everything that was going on, and knew every detail of the Bill as well as they knew that large quantities of arms were being smuggled into the Transvaal in piano cases, ladies' bonnet-cases, etc., took no more notice of them than they did of the importations of the arms to which I have referred. It was therefore thought that when the Bill came over to this country there would be no possible objection to it, and it was not at first thought necessary to send delegates. Thank goodness, wiser counsels did prevail, and five delegates came to England to explain the provisions of this self-made compact of the Australian people. Those delegates had not the smallest right, power, or authority to accept one single word of amendment or alteration in the Bill. They came over solely for the object of explaining the clauses of the Bill. They were very hospitably entertained when they reached London in the early part of this year, but the man in the street, who somehow or another seems to know a great deal more than the Ministers of the Crown, said there was a rift in the lute, and that there were some objections to some of the provisions of the Bill. And then it came out that Mr. Chamberlain had put his back against the wall. In another place the right hon. Gentleman made a public announcement as to the intentions of the Government with regard to the Bill, and before he did so he made a remark which I think your Lordships will have noticed that every English Englishman—by that I mean a man who has never visited the colonies—always makes in speaking about them. The right hon. Gentleman said that the links between this country and the colonies at the present time were so slight that almost a touch would break them. After the way in which the colonies had unanimously rallied to the support of the mother country, when British territory in South Africa was invaded, and invaded under circumstances of preparation for defence which would probably have delighted the heart of Ethelred the Unready, it was astonishing that such a statement should have been made. If there ever was a time when the links between the mother country and the colonies were stronger than ever, it is, I should have thought, the present time, when all parts of the Empire have rallied together in its defence. Having delivered himself of that pious opinion, the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to do what a child of ten would have been able to tell him was the very thing to break these links, if they could be broken, which I deny. He put the Colonial Office finger in the Australian pie, and announced the two great objections which Her Majesty's Government entertained to the Australian Commonwealth Bill, neither of which was mentioned in the noble Earl's speech. The first objection was that the definition of a colony raised a doubt whether the legislation of the new Commonwealth Parliament would or would not come under the provisions of the Colonial Laws Validity Act. There is that old question of definition again, which seems to knock all Colonial legislation on the head. It seems to me that one reason why Her Majesty's Government seem destined once in every ten days to plunge up to their necks in some dreadful difficulty in their Colonial policy is their absolute inability to call a spade a spade. It was said, "You cannot have such an easily mistaken and difficult word as 'Colony' in the Bill; it cannot be allowed. Why put the word 'Colony' in the Bill at all?" The Australian delegates were asked their opinion as to the proposed great change, and they agreed to it with a twinkle in their eye, with gratitude in their hearts, and with their tongues in their cheek. Mr. Chamberlain had triumphed, and Australia breathed again. The second objection—the real lion in the path—was as regards Clause 74, but the noble Earl absolutely omitted to tell us what Clause 74 in its original shape and form was. Clause 74 was simply this, that in all matters relating to Australia, and Australia alone, in which the public interest of any other part of the British Empire was not concerned, the final decision should rest with the High Court, and that there should be no appeal to Downing Street. That was the practical and logical conclusion of Home Rule. It was Home Rule in its best, simplest, and fairest form. But the right hon. Gentleman said to himself, "Am I not a Unionist?" and he kicked the clause as high as Diamond Jubilee did his heels when he went down the course before winning the last Derby. The contention of the Secretary for the Colonies that Clause 74 would destroy one of the most important ties connecting the different parts of the Empire is, at any rate, a logical position, whether one agrees with it or not. That may be the idea of English Englishmen, but is it the idea of the great majority of the Colonists throughout this great Empire? I venture to think not. To get out of the difficulty about the right of appeal the right hon. Gentleman put forward what seems to me, since the Imperial Zollverein, one of the most madcap schemes that was ever devised for tying the tails of the Australian kangaroo and the British lion together in an impossible sailor's knot. He proposed to put a certain number of coronets on the heads of illustrious Colonial Judges, and put £6,000 or £7,000 a year in their pockets.

for a period of seven years. What would happen to them afterwards? He does not make them life Peers—they are to have a lease only of a Peerage; and when the seven years expire I presume they would have to return their robes into store in the same way as a servant who only stays a very short time in a nobleman's family does his plush breeches and liveries. Having succeeded in forming this great judicial body, the right hon. Gentleman took a Palmerstonian attitude, and, putting himself on a pedestal, made a civis Romanus sum and soda-water kind of speech, in which he said that he never would be a party to doing anything which would put an end to the right of every British citizen all over the Empire to lay his grievance at the foot of the Throne, and he was very strongly backed up. That was a perfectly legitimate position, but a dangerous one from the point of view of those who desired to see the expressed wishes of the majority of the Australian people respected. I am speak- under correction, but I believe I am right in saying that the right hon. Gentleman thought he had "four by trumps" in his own hand. He was acting under the ægis and with the advice of the eminent, powerful, noble, and learned Lord who sits on the Woolsack as Lord High Chancellor of England. That, I believe, was well known. He also had the support of the Chief Justices of four of the colonies—men of light and leading, and men of the highest possible honour, whose opinions ought to be very much respected. He had the great advantage of being backed up by The Times, the Melbourne Argus, and the Brisbane Courier, and he had the support of the Member for Australia, Mr. J. Henniker Heaton. He had the additional advantage of publishing a controversial despatch from a Constitutional Governor—it seems to me that Her Majesty's Government have a sort of mania for publishing despatches—and he had the hearty good wishes of the conscientious and honourable opponents of the Australian Federation Bill, who looked upon the right hon. Gentleman's interference with great hope that it would result in the Bill being subjected to a referendum, which, plus British interference, might be the means of staving off the measure for five, ten, fifteen, and perhaps twenty years. The question at that period had assumed an acute phase, and the imminence of the peril and the greatness of the danger afforded the only ground of hope. The future of Australia practically lay in the hands of one man—a man who, unlike all the rest of his colleagues, has two most wonderful characteristics. The first characteristic of the right hon. Gentleman seems to me to be his ability to make himself believe anything he likes at any particular moment. Was he not the man who, throwing aside the Spartan simplicity of his earlier life, was so overcome with the glamour of twenty-five minutes conversation with an Emperor, that he announced to astonished Europe and the amazed Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, that an alliance had been concluded between England, the great Empire of Germany, and the United States? Was he not the man who was so easily able to look at both sides of the question at once, that he openly and publicly, in his place in Parliament, defended the man who was responsible for the greatest mistake of modern times, the unsuccessful invasion of a friendly State by 400 armed men? Was he not the man who at that time used language which threw away the honour and the good name of his country? In the hands of that single man lay the future of Australia. The crisis was a great one. So anxious was the time that the health of one of the delegates, Mr. Deakin, one of the finest representatives of Australian manhood, broke down absolutely, and he had to return to his own country. The only chance lay in the possibility of the right hon. Gentleman finding some way to get round what he had said, and to extricate himself from the dilemma in which he was placed, and, fortunately, that chance came off. The next time the right hon. Gentleman had an opportunity of explaining his position it was evident that he had thrown up the sponge. If the right hon. Gentleman had come forward before the House and acknowledged that he had made a mistake, not one word would have been said on this side of the House or by any Liberal in the whole country. But he did a very different thing. One of those extraordinary transformation scenes took place with which, unfortunately, we have of late become so familiar. The Secretary for the Colonies got off his pedestal, threw off the toga of the Roman citizen and the Palmerstonian frock-coat, and now, being the man who took up a perfectly illogical position which would have emasculated and mutilated the Bill, he stands before the country as one of the creators and champions of Home Rule, or rather rule at home, all over the world. I should like to read to the House what the right hon. Gentleman proposes to do. He said—

"Clause 74 will be exactly reversed. Whereas in the original clause the appeal was to cease in all cases where the public interest of some portion of Her Majesty's Dominions was concerned, in the clause as we now propose to insert it, the appeal will lie in every case except the case where Australian interests alone are concerned."

Does the House of Lords understand that any more than the House of Commons did? It seems to me a distinction without a difference. Punch's Kangaroo remarked—

"Well, I suppose I've got what I wanted; but I'm hanged if I know what I've got."

The right hon. Gentleman performed a most extraordinary feat of political legerdemain. He took up this 74th Clause, which, he said, was doing away with the ties which connect the Empire, threw it up into the air and caught it again, turned it inside out, and then handed it across the Table as the Chamberlain compromise. It was done so rapidly that it took the House of Commons in, and especially Mr. Asquith, who got up and congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on having arrived at a solution which was honourable to both sides. The House of Commons apparently went home thinking that such an agreement had been arrived at. But there is a French proverb which says, La nuit porte conseil, and when the Members of the House of Commons came down to breakfast and read their Times they found there was no agreement at all, but a surrender. As the critic of The Times newspaper said—

"To all appearances the Colonies were ready to acquiesce in the original decision of the home Government. But time may, perhaps, show that here the sacrifice has been excessive and unwise."

It was no longer an agreement, but a sacrifice. Men went forth to their labours. They read the Daily News, the Daily Chronicle, and the Westminster Gazette, and the scales fell from their eyes. They discovered that this so-called agreement was a surrender, a surrender, I admit, of an impossible and dangerous position, and a position that never ought to have been taken up, but a surrender as complete and as unconditional as that of the Boer commander Cronje to the soldier-statesman Lord Roberts. I should like to ask what is the position of those men who so loyally supported the right hon. Gentleman when he decided to knock out the 74th clause and to retain the Privy Council? What shall we hear from noble Lords who supported this action of Mr. Chamberlain? Shall we hear that they have changed their mind with the Secretary of State, and that they agree with this unconditional capitulation? I have but one word more to say. I hope the House will put its foot down on the doctrine which has been assiduously preached in some places, that Australian nationalism and federation is a Tory discovery, and that the friendship and support of the colonies are of Tory creation. This has been preached in the country by people who ought to know better, and I hope that both sides of the House will stand shoulder to shoulder in their determination to stamp out any attempt to make political capital out of Australian federation. I have to apologise for having made such a lengthy speech, but I must say, in conclusion, that we unitedly hail the wise and patriotic action of Australia as a step towards that still larger federation of equal rights and common citizenship under the Crown, and towards that dual allotment of responsibility in all dealings with other nations which must give permanent security to our Empire at large. A united House of Lords offers its congratulations to the delegates on the victory they have so deservedly won, and a united Empire will congratulate your Lordships' historical and hereditary House on unanimously passing the Second Reading of the Australian Commonwealth Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I have listened with amazement and the greatest possible pain to the oration which has just been made. The noble Lord lays down the dogmatic proposition that it is undesirable to make political capital out of this Bill. Yet he has given an extraordinary and distinguished example of the wish to do it himself. I should like to know very much what is the attitude of the Liberal party in respect of this Bill. Do they admire it and desire it to be passed, or not? Judging from the conclusion of the noble Lord's observations, he desired that both sides of the House unanimously and with great applause should pass this Bill. May I ask, if that was the meaning of his oration, what was the object and purpose of that oration? In what one respect beyond his concluding sentence has he said anything to induce you to pass it with that applause, beyond a very violent and, if he will forgive me for saying so, I think a very inappropriate attack upon the Secretary for the Colonies, in which not only his conduct in respect of this particular Bill (as to which I shall say a word presently), but in respect of his whole political career has been the subject of a most violent attack? May I suggest to him that it is very easy to say hard things of persons who are not present to defend themselves? Mr. Chamberlain, I can assure him, is quite able to answer for himself, and if in the House in which he sits and speaks this oration had been made, I am sure he would have had a good answer to each of the gibes the noble Lord has indulged in. What are we dealing with?—a Bill that has been approved of by the Australian people and by the House of Commons (on both sides) in its present form; and I do not understand what the noble Lord means by his suggestion that after the House had approved of it they woke up next morning and found they had been deluded. What evidence is there of that? I am not aware that the House of Commons has retracted the approval it gave, or was so confused that it did not know what it was doing. Upon what authority does the noble Lord say that the Liberal party retracted their approval, and is he put up here to say that the Liberal party, if they dared, would refuse to accept this Bill? If not, what is the meaning of the statement that the House of Commons had changed its mind and did not know what it was doing? I am afraid the noble Lord is intoxicated by his own eloquence. What is the objection to what has been done with great care, assiduity, and skill? My right hon. friend the Colonial Secretary welcomed the views of the delegates, listened to their objections, and pointed out the extent to which he was not able to meet their views. When, after consultation with the various Prime Ministers of the various colonies, they came round to what has been called a fair and intelligible compromise, the House of Commons unanimously, I may say, approved of and admired the skill with which that compromise had been effected. What are we discussing? What does the noble Lord object to? What is there now in the Bill which can justify his extraordinary attack on Mr. Chamberlain? I am not aware that the noble Lord has pointed out anything that is wrong. Is this speech to be quoted in Australia as the opinion of noble Lords on the Liberal side of this House in respect to this measure? The legal, commercial, and all the other elements which constitute Australia's greatness have approved of this Bill, and it is received in this House by a speech in which every gibe which ingenuity and fluent rhetoric could suggest was levelled at the Colonial Secretary for accepting that view. I do not know what is supposed to be the object of this speech, but it appears to me that it is calculated to do great mischief and is calculated to spoil the harmony and the unanimity with which this country accepted this Bill. It certainly will give rise to the suspicion that, though the Liberal party in the House of Commons accepted this Bill in the spirit in which they did accept it, it was sorely against their will to do so, and if they had had the chance they would have rejected it. I hope that that is not the case, though it is what the noble Earl's attack on Mr. Chamberlain would lead one to suppose. I do not descend to argue what has not been argued at all, but what has been thrown out as a mere suggestion. I rise solely for the purpose of making this protest against what is, to my mind, a most mischievous speech, calculated to give great offence and to do no possible good that any human being can suggest.

*LORD DAVEY: My Lords, I regret that the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has not given any explanation as to some of the clauses of this Bill which have been referred to. I shall not, of course, follow the Lord Chancellor in the remarks he made upon the speech of the noble Earl below me, but shall confine myself to a few criticisms of the Bill. I do so, not with any hostile intention towards the Bill, but because this is the only opportunity one will have of offering such criticisms. In the concluding words of the speech of the noble Earl who moved the Second Reading I am sure every one of your Lordships will concur—namely, in congratulating the people of Australia on having brought this great project to so successful an issue. I am disposed to go further and to say that I feel sure those of your Lordships who have studied this Bill, including those who take part in the judicial business of this House, must have been struck by the care, pains, and skill with which this Bill has been constructed. It is not humanly possible to so frame a Bill of this kind as to avoid giving loophooles for litigation, but I have never seen any Bill drawn more skilfully and with greater care than this one. I would like to draw your Lordships' attention for one moment to Clause 51. That is a very remarkable clause, because, differing from the analogy of the Constitution of the great Dominion of Canada, it does not propose to give exclusive powers to the Parliament of the Commonwealth, but names a number of subjects on which the latter will have concurrent jurisdiction, as the noble Earl said, with the Parliaments of the different States which compose the Commonwealth. In that way you will avoid many questions which have arisen between the provinces and the Dominion of Canada as to the limits of their legislation. But, on the other hand, I am afraid the Australian people will find that they will fall into another class of difficulty—namely, the difficulty of reconciling the Acts passed by the Commonwealth Parliament with the Acts passed by the different Parliaments of the different States on the same subjects. There will, in short, inevitably be considerable overlapping. Those of your Lordships who have looked through the numerous subjects included in Section 51 must have been struck by their generality. That is no fault of the Bill, because in a Bill of this kind you cannot foresee the detailed manner in which these questions will arise, and all you can do is to lay down general principles regulating the legislative limits of the Parliament. But the generality with which this clause is expressed will, of course, give rise to many questions. Undoubtedly many questions of a Constitutional character will crop up both as to the limits of the legislative powers of the Commonwealth and of the States, and also as to the reconciling of Acts passed by both the States and the Commonwealth under their co-ordinate powers. During my practice, which was spread over a great many years, before the Judicial Committee, and since I have had the honour of a seat on that body, I have made the personal acquaintance of many of the gentlemen who have been and are judges of the Australian Courts, and I have had an opportunity of seeing their ability and the impartiality and integrity with which the judicial work in Australia is carried on. I have no doubt that the Judges of the Australian Courts will approach the consideration of these constitutional questions in a large and statesmanlike spirit, and will treat this Act as it ought to be treated, more in the nature of a treaty for the purpose of reconciling conflicting interests. The fact that it must inevitably lead to a great many difficult questions lends all the more importance to the consideration of the clause which was referred to by the noble Earl, and which has been so much discussed, not only in Parliament, but in the public press and in the country—namely, Clause 74. That clause has gone through, I think, four transformations. As it originally appeared it provided that no appeal should be permitted to the Queen in Council on any matter involving an interpretation of the Constitution unless the public interest of some part of Her Majesty's dominions other than the Commonwealth or the States was concerned. But as regards matters not involving any constitutional question, the appeal would lie from the High Court to Her Majesty in Council by the leave of Her Majesty in Council. The first proposal made by the Government, as I understand it, was that the appeal to Her Majesty in Council should be maintained intact. That was found impossible. The second proposal was, I think, of a rather extraordinary character. It was that an appeal should be allowed with the consent of the States involved. That amounted to saying that a defeated litigant should not be allowed to appeal except with the leave of his victorious opponent, and that could not be maintained for a single moment. Next we have the clause as it is at present, and it is most important to consider in what way it differs from the clause as it originally stood. In the first place, I have an old-fashioned prejudice in favour of the English language in a British Act of Parliament, and I do not see why Latin words should be introduced when English words would do just as well. But that is rather a small criticism. I should like to know what is the meaning of the words "unless the High Court shall certify that the question is one which ought to be determined by Her Majesty in Council." If it means nothing more than that no appeal shall be allowed except with the leave of the High Court, then I can understand it. But what is the meaning of "one which ought to be determined"? The clause means nothing more, I apprehend, than this, that an appeal shall not lie without the leave of the High Court, leaving the High Court to lay down the principles and conditions under which such leave shall be granted. I think it is a great pity that the ordinary well-known legal language was not used in this case. Coming to the substance of the clause, it appears to me that it is both larger and narrower than the original clause. It is larger because it gives larger jurisdiction to the High Court, those very important words to which, I understood, the Colonial Secretary attached considerable importance, having been omitted. The original clause contained the words "unless the public interest of some part of Her Majesty's dominions other than the Commonwealth is concerned." I should like to ask why those words are omitted in the clause as it at present stands. As the Bill was originally drafted there was an appeal to the Queen in Council, by leave of the Queen in Council, from the decision of the High Court on constitutional questions which affected the public interest of any other part of Her Majesty's dominions, but under the clause as it is at present worded, although the question may be one vitally affecting some other part of Her Majesty's dominions, no appeal will lie to Her Majesty in Council except by the leave of the High Court itself. I think we are entitled to some explanation why those words have been omitted. As the Bill originally stood constitutional questions were made the exclusive jurisdiction of the High Court. In that respect the clause as it at present stands differs very materially, and it also differs in this, that an appeal—and this is a matter of very considerable importance—will lie from any of the State Courts to the Privy Council, that is, to Her Majesty in Council, on any constitutional question, as well as on any other question, as it did before. As the Bill was originally framed no constitutional question, whether it came from the State Courts or the High Court, could be brought by way of appeal to Her Majesty in Council, but as the Bill now stands constitutional questions may come direct from the State Courts to Her Majesty in Council. I do not hesitate to express my personal opinion that constitutional questions are exactly the class of questions which I should have thought that Australians would have wished to refer to Her Majesty in Council. And for this reason. In a question between individuals the matter may, and generally does, affect merely the interests of the individuals, but constitutional questions between two States may create a vast amount of feeling in those States. Suppose a question arose between Victoria and New South Wales. It is inevitable that a certain amount of local and State feeling would arise. At any rate, it is quite possible that friction would accrue. I do not question the absolute impartiality and integrity of the Australian Judges, but it is important, not only that they should decide the question impartially, but also that the public should believe that they would decide it impartially, and I should consider that there was a danger that the public might think, in a burning question which excited interest in two States, that the opinions of the Judges in the Australian Court had been more or less influenced by outside agitation. Do not believe for a moment that I say I think it would be so. I do not. But I say they ought to be preserved from any suspicion of that kind, and for that reason I should have thought that this was exactly the class of cases which would more fitly come to be decided by a tribunal which, whatever may be said of it, is not influenced by local or colonial agitation. I admit, in the fullest possible manner, that that is a question for Australians themselves to decide, and as they have thought fit to come to that decision—no doubt from excellent reasons and after much debate and discussion—I do not wish that the opinion of this country should override Australian opinion on the subject. It has been said that the arrangement which is at present made by Clause 74, is, in substance, that which prevails in the Dominion of Canada, and I observed that the noble Lord, in the very interesting and able speech with which he introduced this Bill, made an observation which had previously been made by the Attorney General in another place. But it appears to me that the difference between the two is absolutely vital. In Canada, as the noble Earl justly said, a litigant can appeal straight from the Provincial Court to Her Majesty in Council, or he may, if he prefers it, appeal to the Supreme Court, and there in no appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court without the leave of Her Majesty in Council. I may here take the liberty of saying that it is an exceedingly difficult thing to obtain that leave; it is only given where a really serious question affecting not merely the interests of the litigants but of others of Her Majesty's subjects, such as the construction of an Act of Parliament or something of that kind is concerned. Permission is not usually given in cases where the Supreme Court has agreed with the Provincial Court, or unless there has been considerable difference, as there sometimes is, of judicial opinion within the Supreme Court itself. No doubt some conditions of the kind will be observed by the High Court of Australia in giving leave, when they are asked to do so, for an appeal from their decision; but, as I said just now, the difference between the two cases appears to be vital. Clause 74 as it stands is a perfect solecism in jurisprudence, and for this reason, that it creates two final coordinate courts of appeal, neither of which is bound by the decision of the other. Suppose, for instance, a question arises in one of the State Courts, and it goes by way of appeal to the High Court, and the High Court decides unanimously one way. The same question, we will suppose, arises affecting the same States or different States—it matters not much—and the defeated litigant (the State Court having followed the decision of the High Court) appeals to Her Majesty in Council, and the Judicial Committee advises Her Majesty to take a different view from that taken in the High Court, with the result that a decision is given the other way. The Judicial Committee, of course, is not bound by the decision of the High Court, nor, as I understand, is the High Court bound to follow the decisions of the Judicial Committee in matters of this kind. They may therefore each maintain their own opinion. I know that the answer that may be made to me is that the Australian Judges are men of such high principle and good sense that they will find some way of either agreeing with the Judicial Committee, or of allowing the matter to be finally decided. They may; but it lies in their discretion, and unless they do so you will have two coordinate Supreme Courts of Appeal from the same Courts on the same class of subjects deciding in entirely different ways. That, I venture to think, is a solecism in jurisprudence. Just consider in what condition the State Courts would be put in that case. You would have this very curious result, that the men who were victorious in the State Courts would always be defeated ultimately; and for this reason. If a State Court followed the decision of the High Court the defeated litigant, of course, would not then go to the High Court but to Her Majesty in Council. But, on the other hand, if the State Court, not considering itself bound by the High Court, should follow the decision of the Privy Council, then the defeated litigant would, of course, go to the High Court and the High Court would maintain its own opinion and reverse the opinion of the State Court. Therefore, whoever gets the first decision in the State Court under this clause, if it is maintained in its present form, must suffer ultimate defeat. I do not think that is a very happy solution of the difficulty. The original clause was perfectly logical. It gave the High Court exclusive jurisdiction, but the present clause does not commend itself to my judgment or experience. I do not suggest that your Lordships should make any alteration in the clause. I have made these criticisms in the hope that the question may be considered by the Australian authorities, who have the power, if they think fit to exercise it, of making such modifications in the clause as will remedy the inconvenience I have pointed out. I saw in the ordinary sources of information this morning a suggestion by a gentleman who writes with some knowledge of the subject—I think one of the Australian Judges—that it should be altered in this way, that whenever the High Court disagreed with the Court below (the State Court) on a constitutional question, then there should be an appeal to Her Majesty in Council as of right. That, of course, would at once remove any inconvenience that might otherwise be felt, because then the Privy Council would continue to be the sole ultimate appeal authority. But whether any provision of that kind can be adopted is, of course, as I have said, a matter entirely for the Australian statesmen and lawyers to settle for themselves. I have only to say, in conclusion, that I hope my humble contribution to the criticisms of this Bill will not be misunderstood. It is not conceived in a spirit of hostility. I have no right, in answer to the challenge of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, to speak for the Liberal party, but I can only say, as a humble member of that party, that I rejoice as heartily as any of your Lordships at the introduction of this Bill.

*THE EARL OF JERSEY: My Lords, after what has fallen from the noble and learned Lord, the Lord Chancellor, I shall not detain your Lordships except for a few observations with regard to two points. I think the noble Lord opposite did not do justice to the speech in which the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies opened this debate. I thought the speech of my noble friend Lord Selborne was certainly couched in clear and distinct terms, and he brought before the House all the salient points in the Bill. We must remember that this measure has been before the public for a great many months, that it has been followed very closely, and that as it comes before the House it is the result not only of the views of the other House of Parliament but also of the views which are held by the very Colonies of Australia who are interested in the matter. There was also one other point the noble Earl mentioned. He was surprised that the Colonial Office had not interfered to express their views when this measure was being discussed in Australia. I thought it was the great glory of this Bill that it was the work of Australians for Australia, and I could imagine the indignation which would have been raised through the voice of the noble Earl opposite if the Colonial Office had taken upon themselves to tell Australia what their Commonwealth Bill should be. My Lords, my words will be very few, and my only excuse for saying anything at all is on account of the interest I must naturally take in the welfare of Australia. The Parliament and the people of this country have accepted this measure with trust and hope, and why have they done so? The gallant deeds of the Australian troops, and the enthusiasm of the Australian people, have created the greatest interest in this country, and the feeling that not only are we one by race and language, but also in spirit and sentiment. But those who have had the advantage and the honour of being associated with Australian Parliaments and Australian public men have an additional and a greater reason for their hope and trust. May I, just in passing, say that I feel perfectly certain that there is no body of men who can be more trusted to do their duty free from outside pressure and free from outside excitement than the Gentlemen who fill the posts of Judges in that country. The same questions, the same problems, which we have to deal with at home are also to be met and to be dealt with in Australia. They have been dealt with hitherto with great success, and we have some reason to believe and to feel confident that, as these questions have been dealt with in the several colonies successfully, so when there is a united Parliament to deal with them they will be dealt with even still more successfully, and that if under the old régime the different colonies have advanced rapidly to success, still more rapid will be the advance of Australia when all her best councillors meet together in unison. Now consider what this measure will effect. A vast continent, almost as large as Europe, will for the first time be joined together under one directing Government. Hitherto there have been no less than six different Governments dealing with that continent, and some of them sometimes actuated, one must admit, by a spirit of jealousy, which, we trust, will for ever now disappear. The power of this united country will be something enormous. Its policy—and everyone must admit that Australia should be supreme, should be predominant, at any rate, in the Pacific Ocean—and the direction of its sentiment will be under one head, so that we may feel certain that we are creating a country which in time to come will probably do on that side of the world what we hope, not in vain, I trust, that Great Britain has done in this part. And, my Lords, can any country be started upon a fairer basis than the one which we are about to start now? Because we must remember that, by this Commonwealth Bill, United Australia in a few years will be totally different to what it has been in the past, with its separate colonies, and I certainly believe that, under Divine Providence, we* are about to give the most priceless gift which our generation, or almost any generation, can give to those who hereafter will live to enjoy the blessings of a free Constitution. My Lords, there is no doubt that a measure like this has not been arrived at without a great deal of labour and trouble; conflicting interests have been brought together; and we ought to give our meed of admiration to those who, not only in the Convention, but in addressing their fellow-citizens, have succeeded in bringing the people of Australia nearly to one mind upon this subject. I quite agree with what the noble Earl said, that men like Mr. Kingston and Mr. Barton and Mr. Deakin deserve well of the Empire also for their work, in the way in which they have shown their abilities and their common-sense in dealing with the difficult questions they have had to deal with in this country. In the future history of the Empire it is almost certain that there will be from time to time awkward questions arising, questions which can only be settled by the exercise of common-sense and goodwill upon both sides; and surely, if any man may feel satisfied with what he has done during six years it is the Colonial Secretary, notwithstanding the attack of the noble Earl opposite. If it had not been for him it is quite possible that this question would have been in a very different position now. He requires no praise from me, but, at any rate, he must have the satisfaction of knowing that the result of his labour has been that the House of Commons has passed this measure, that this House is not prepared—not one, I believe, in this House is prepared—to go against it, and that he has the support of all the five colonies interested. That must, after all, be the best answer that can be given to any attack as to whether he acted well or not. My Lords, I will say no more, except this: that we are about to set our seal upon a measure which will not only add to the power of Australia for good in the future, but which will also sensibly increase the resources and the strength of the whole Empire.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, in the first place I wish to dispel any idea that may be entertained by the noble Earl on the Woolsack or any Member of this House, that I do not regard this Bill with the utmost favour taken as a whole. I regard it as a most auspicious event to the Empire. I regard it as reflecting the highest credit upon the Australian statesmen who, with much difficulty, have managed to frame what is admitted on all hands to be a most excellently drawn up Constitution for that great country. After all that has been said it is really unnecessary to go into the matter at large, or to say anything more than that it is an auspicious occasion. We are not called upon to criticise the greater part of this Bill. That has passed without any objection whatever. The noble Earl who moved the Second Reading very properly and very clearly went through the different clauses of the Bill. I am not going to discuss these clauses, with the exception of one to which I will refer presently, because there has really been no contest whatever with regard to them. I wish to impress upon the House, turning our eyes altogether for a moment from the one disputed clause, that it is to the highest credit of those who framed this Bill that it should be a Bill which, taken generally, and even in detail, has met with the general approval of the British Parliament. I say that that is a remarkable effort in the way of drawing up a constitutional document. We have never attempted to draw up a Constitution in writing in this country, and I should have doubted myself whether we were qualified to do it. But I should change my mind now, because I should say that probably we are as well qualified as our Australian brethren, and our Australian fellow-subjects have shown us that it is quite possible for men of the English race to draw up a constitutional document of this kind with perfect success and clearness. Now, my Lords, having said that, I will not trouble the House on the subject of the Bill generally, because I think I should be occupying your time unnecessarily; but I will now refer for a moment to Clause 74, which has been the subject of considerable controversy. Of course, I am not going to attempt to discuss the legal questions involved. I must, however, say a word in reference to the remarks of my noble friend Lord Carrington upon this Clause 74, around which has raged whatever controversy there has been. It is perfectly true that there are men on this side of the House—and I am perfectly free to confess that I include myself among them—who, however they may regard this as a non-party matter and rejoice at the establishment of this Constitution for Australia, yet do not think themselves entirely debarred from criticism as to the manner in which the controversy on Clause 74 has been conducted. I hope I am not usually ungenerous to opponents, and I certainly have not the least wish to be ungenerous towards the Colonial Secretary; but I think there is an impression—and something said by the noble Lord who has just sat down rather tends to confirm it—that there has been a desire shown to ascribe an undue amount of credit to the right hon. Gentleman for his share in bringing about the settlement of this Constitution. In point of fact, the passing of this Bill, except in regard to the 74th Clause, did not depend upon any Colonial Secretary, nor, in point of fact, did it depend on Her Majesty's Government, because it was not framed here and did not proceed from any suggestion from Her Majesty's Government; and, indeed, I think it is to the credit of Her Majesty's Government and of all parties that they did not commit the egregious error of attempting by proposals made here to induce the Australian colonies to adopt a federation. I have always held, and I am more than ever convinced of it, that all proposals for federation should emanate from the colonists themselves. Without going back upon an old subject which is present to my mind, I must say that the attempt of an old friend of mine, whom I much esteemed, though he was a political opponent, Lord Carnarvon, by active measures on the part of Her Majesty's Government to bring about federation in South Africa, was one of the most disastrous events in the history of those colonies. Perhaps I may be allowed to say that my noble friend, after he had determined upon his action, came across to me in this House and spoke to me about it. I told him I was entirely in favour of federation, but I condemned his action and told him his attempt would end disastrously, though I promised him I would put no impediment in his way. I regret to say that my prevision turned out to be well founded. I merely mention this by the way, but again I say it is not reasonable or fair to give exclusive credit to the Minister upon whom happens to devolve the duty of carrying a measure of this kind through Parliament. I do not wish to detract from the value of the service rendered by any Minister, but I do say it is not right to ascribe credit for the Bill to Mr. Chamberlain, or in fact to any one in this country. With regard to Clause 74, I cannot help thinking, reading the clause as it stands here and referring to the clause as it stood in the original draft, and without professing to have any great legal knowledge, the difference is by no means large, and I have extreme doubt whether any particular advantage has been gained by all the controversy which has been set up. The clause, as it stands is, no doubt open to criticism, as my noble friend behind me has shown. The clause as it stood protected specially, in direct terms, any interest which might be outside the Australian colonies; the clause as it stands does not give that protection. Well, I am not saying that I attach very serious importance to it, but still you must set off one thing against another, and I doubt very much indeed whether much has been gained, while undoubtedly, although the whole matter has ended happily, some considerable risk was run in the course that was taken, and considerable apprehension was roused in the minds of many who were greatly in favour of the Bill. No doubt a settlement has been arrived at; no one rejoices more than I do that that settlement has been arrived at, and that it is accepted by the colonies; but I doubt very much whether anything was gained by running the considerable risk of questioning what the colonial referendum had approved. The fact that these numerous changes were made in the proposals laid before the other House showed, in my opinion, not any very judicious apprehension of the whole matter, nor do I think it showed any particular skill in negotiation or in the managing of the Bill. However, all's well that ends well; and I am quite willing to congratulate the Colonial Secretary that this matter has ended as it has ended. The noble Lord on the Woolsack spoke very severely of my noble friend near me, and said, as I understood him, not only that he had made an attack upon Mr. Chamberlain, but also that he in point of fact had attacked the Bill. Now, I understood my noble friend to have as strong a feeling of approval of the Bill, speaking of the Bill generally, as any noble Lord in this House; and therefore the matter turns entirely upon the attack which he made on Mr. Chamberlain. I think we cannot altogether exclude from our debates attacks upon statesmen in the other House, who sometimes are not very scrupulous in their attacks upon those who sit here; and, although I think I may say that I have no particular tendency that way, yet I have heard in this House, in the course of my experience here, very severe attacks indeed made upon colleagues of mine by distinguished members of the Opposition. I shall not mention their names now, because, unhappily, they are no longer Members of this House, but they were very distinguished men, of great authority—I mean the men who made the attacks—men who justly commanded admiration, not only from their own party, but, by reason of their ability, from those who opposed them; and I certainly have heard not a few attacks which have been made of a very severe character indeed upon Members of the other House. I remember one to which I myself undoubtedly took exception, very much in the way that to-night exception has been taken to the remarks of my noble friend. It is always a very convenient thing to say, "Oh, you must not make an attack in this House upon a Member of the other House." Well, for my own part, I confess that I would always rather have my opponent facing me—that would be more agreeable to me and fairer to him; but we cannot altogether exclude from our debates in this House comments upon the proceedings, the opinions, and even sometimes the character of public men who occupy high and distinguished positions in the other House, and I should protest against any doctrine that laid it down that such attacks should be altogether excluded. I say that entirely apart from the merit of the attack; each case must be judged by itself; attacks may be made which are not deserved, and attacks may be made which are deserved. My noble friend, I think, might have some ground for criticising the manner in which the negotiations were conducted, and I, myself, cannot help thinking that there was a great want of foresight in not having, during the time that these matters were under discussion in Australia, confidentially made known to the statesmen of that country, without interfering directly with them, what were the opinions held here upon so important and so very difficult a matter as the question of the appeal to the Privy Council. It seems to me that that kind of assistance ought to have been given to the Australian statesmen; if they had been made aware of what was the opinion of the highest authorities in this country, which might easily have been conveyed to them two or three years ago, it might have led, not to a formal agreement embodied in despatches, but to the production of some clause which would have been accepted beforehand by all parties. I do not mean negotiations. I merely mean that they might have been made acquainted with the views of important people here in a confidential manner. My Lords, I have really nothing more to say to your Lordships, except again to repeat that I welcome this as a very great and most important measure; and I believe, with the noble Earl who has just sat down, that it will tend to the augmentation of the prosperity and the contentment of our great colonies in Australia, that it will strengthen the whole Empire, and that, as he said most justly, it will lay the foundation of such a State as we may hope may eventually prove to be one of the most important branches of this Empire—taking part in the defence of the Empire, showing to us, by experiments which they can easily try in a new community, and which we cannot so well try in an old community, what may be the best mode of dealing with the new problems which from time to time arise. And I look forward to the day when, if we continue to allow them to govern themselves in their own way, with as little interference with them as it is possible to exercise, this country will be surrounded by a number of great States, descended from us, which will form part of the Empire, but in point of fact will be close allies, bound to us not merely by ties of interest, but also by that strongest and most important tie—the tie of common kindred, common loyalty to a common Sovereign.

*Lord JAMES of HEREFORD: My Lords, this Bill has been subjected to different degrees of criticism, and those who have been connected with it have had their actions somewhat criticised. The speech of the noble Earl opposite, Earl Carrington, I think will live in the memories of most of us—at any rate, the humorous and good-natured portions of his speech; and I think we shall be disposed in the end to come to the conclusion that the noble Earl did not intend to attack very violently either the measure or the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of it in the other House. We learn from the noble Earl opposite that Lord Carrington is an enthusiastic supporter of this Bill—that he approves of it as much as the promoter of it. Why, then, the promoter of it was so attacked it is not worth while to discuss. One sentence in the speech of the noble Earl, the Leader of the Opposition, was somewhat superfluous—it was the statement that he was not in the habit of attacking his political opponents unduly, for I feel sure there is not a Member of this House who is not well aware that the noble Earl opposite is not apt to criticise political opponents unduly, and that he never makes an unfair attack upon those with whom he differs. Now may I call the attention of the House very briefly to what the criticism of the noble Earl opposite is? He does not object to the wording of the Bill; he does not object very much to the course taken by the Minister who had the principal charge of this Bill in the negotiations here; but it is rather a criticism of a negative character. Why, says the noble Earl, did not the Colonial Secretary some two or three years ago make a communication in an informal manner to those who represented the colonies, and tell them what his thoughts were upon the subject? Now I appeal to the noble Earl's fairness, the admiration for which he has so truly won from the House. He goes back to the year 1897. In 1897 the representatives of the colonies came to this country, and the Colonial Secretary made to them exactly the communication which the noble Earl now says he ought to have made. He has stated in the House of Commons that he did take that course. Now, accepting as we do the very eloquent peroration of the noble Earl that we are all agreed upon the beneficent objects of this Bill and the manner in which it has been conducted, do let it be noted that here in this Chamber the only criticism which the Leader of the Opposition has to make in respect of the Bill, or the conduct of, it is to complain that that was not done which was absolutely done in the very terms in which he says it ought to have been done. Mr. Chamberlain took the very course which the noble Earl says he ought to have taken; and I hope it will go forth that the course which the member of the Government who had charge of the Bill took was the very course that the noble Earl with all his experience and judgment and his knowledge of the colonies—having been in the Colonial Office—says ought to have been taken by those in charge of the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Will the noble Lord allow me to say one word? The Bill was not printed, if I remember rightly, in 1898. Of course, my view was that a communication ought to have been made upon the words of the Bill as it was provisionally framed—not that before the Bill was provisionally framed the matter should have been gone into. I said two or three years ago, and I was not far out in my dates, but that was what I meant.

*LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: I think the noble Earl's explanation leaves the matter as I put it; but was it not wiser for the Colonial Secretary to suggest his views and to state before the Bill was framed what his views were? If he had delayed doing so, would not the observation which fell from my noble friend Lord Jersey have come into effect—what would the colonies have said if they had been interfered with by the home Government at the very time when they were in federation trying to agree upon a Commonwealth Bill? The Colonial Secretary really took the very course which the noble Earl himself says ought to have been taken. Now I desire to deal very briefly with some of the criticisms which fell from my noble friend Lord Davey. I am sure that here again we shall agree that all his criticisms were uttered in a spirit of good feeling towards this Bill. His first criticism was upon Clause 51. Of course that clause involves a great deal of overlapping, because there might be a conflict between the State Parliament, the Provincial Parliaments, and the Federated Parliament. Everyone has borne testimony to the way in which this Bill has been drawn in Australia. The noble Earl, Lord Carrington, said that the Secretary of State ought to have accepted the Bill in totidem verbis—that he ought not to have rejected anything.

*LORD DAVEY: I think my noble friend has misunderstood me. I think

I said expressly that the Bill excited my admiration; but I said that it was inevitable that there must be overlapping, not from any defect in the drawing of the Bill, but from the nature of the subject.

*LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: The noble Lord, I understood, maintained that Clause 51 would produce that result.

*LORD DAVEY: Not from any defect in the drafting of the Bill.

*LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: It is not a matter of drafting, but I think my noble friend's attention cannot have been called to the very important consideration that those who drew the Bill in Australia saw that some overlapping might occur, because in Clause 109 they deal with this very difficulty. The clause says—

"When the law of the State is inconsistent with a law of the Commonwealth the latter shall prevail, and the former shall, to the extent of the inconsistency, be invalid."

So that they saw that very point, and they made provision for it. Overlapping, as my noble friend says, was inevitable from the nature of the question, but they provide that when it does occur the law of the Commonwealth shall prevail as against the law of the province. Now, my Lords, only two other principal objections were taken by Lord Davey. I am sorry to detain your Lordships at all, and I will therefore be as brief as I possibly can. My noble friend said in the first place that there was a difference between the appeal which exists in Canada being given by the leave of the Privy Council and the appeal that was given by the leave of the High Court. That is so, but I should say that the method suggested by this Bill is the better. It is in favour of the colony. The suitor from Australia would have to come to this country and produce before the Privy Council here all his statements, in order to obtain his leave to appeal. It is easy to see what an expensive process this would be to the suitor living thousands of miles away. The High Court has all the necessary knowledge before it. It has the counsel engaged in the case, and it has full knowledge of the case, and then and there at the end of the case the application can be made, at no expense, probably, at all—at least, a very nominal expense. That is a great advantage to the colonial suitor, and is it not advisable to meet the wishes of the colonies upon this point, and to give to their Court the right of giving leave to appeal, rather than bring the suitor here this long distance to obtain that leave? It is nothing to say that on a matter of procedure of this kind—not a matter of principle—there would be a difference of procedure between Canada and Australia, if the interests of the Australian suitor have been considered. Now, only one other main objection was taken by my noble friend. He pointed out that under Clause 74—and I really think that this is the substance that we have to deal with—you will have an appeal from the State Court and you will have an appeal from the High Court.

*LORD DAVEY: No; either to the High Court or to the Privy Council.

*LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: I said so—from the High Court to the Privy Council.

*LORD DAVEY: From the State Court.

*LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: The objection my noble friend made is grounded entirely on this: that you will have a judgment of two co-ordinate Courts, and that there will be no superior judgment of one Court only. If my noble friend will allow me for once to differ from him, I do not think that is so. I think that the decision of the Privy Council would prevail, and must prevail. The decision is the decision of the Queen. It is not the decision of any body of men—it is the decision of the Queen herself, the fountain of justice administering justice throughout her Empire both at home and abroad. No man delivers that judgment personally, it is delivered in the name of the Queen herself. There is an appeal from the High Court to the Privy Council, and as the Privy Council has the power of reversing the opinion of the High Court, not only by mere comity, but in fact, the decision of the Privy Council would be superior to and would affect the judgment of the High Court, and no judge of the High Court in Australia would presume to say that the judgment of that Court should prevail against the judgment of the Privy Council. This point has been fully considered by those whose judgment the Government had a right to rely upon, and it is their firm belief that that is the case. This is the view that, after remission of the state of things to the advisors of the colonies by their delegates, has been arrived at as a fair solution. I hope that the spirit which the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition has shown us, is the unanimous feeling of this House—that really there is nothing by way of criticism that ought to cast a doubt on the efficiency of this great measure, which has been placed in the position it occupies mainly by the great efforts and discretion of my right hon. friend Mr. Chamberlain.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN: My Lords, I do not propose at this hour, notwithstanding the importance of the discussion, to occupy your Lordships beyond a moment or two. I confess, having listened to the whole of this debate, there has seemed to me to be an air of unreality about it except in one respect, namely, in the concurrence—the gratifying concurrence—in all the speeches delivered on both sides of the House in rejoicing that this measure is about to receive the assent of the Imperial Parliament. I say the tone of the debate is unreal, because one cannot shut ones eyes to the fact that, recollecting the history of this Bill, the enormous labour that its preparation involved, the necessity for the assents to the very terms of the Bill of so many widely diversified and widely apart interests, no one proposes to introduce an Amendment into the Bill, but we all understand that it is to be passed in the exact form in which it left the House of Commons; therefore our discussion is of an academic character. But I cannot pass without noticing the criticism of my noble and learned friend who has just sat down upon the speech of my noble friend near me (Lord Davey). The first point which it seems to me necessary to draw attention to is the effect of the original appeal clause as it stood in the proposition of the delegates. Now, I do not agree at all with my noble friend the Earl of Carrington, who opened the debate on this side of the House, in undervaluing, or regarding as an unimportant thing, the question of an ultimate appeal to the Queen in Council. On the contrary, I should have liked to see this Bill give unrestricted rights of appeal, subject to the leave of the Privy Council, and subject to regulations with reference to the importance of the subject-matter in controversy and the like, but unrestricted liberty of appeal in every question in which other than purely Australian interests were concerned. For I regard that right of appeal to the Queen in Council, not merely as an important indication of the Imperial Sovereignty of the United Kingdom, and of this Imperial Parliament as its mouthpiece, but also as a not unimportant factor operating in the direction of a uniformity of system of law between the home country and the colonies, and even a not unimportant factor, working in the direction as far as varying circumstances may properly admit, of something approaching uniformity in the law itself. Now, as the Bill was originally presented this was its effect; that appeals were allowed in all matters except certain constitutional questions there referred to, and even in those questions appeal was allowed to the Queen in Council where any public interest was involved. This is the exact effect of the original clause as it stood, which clearly recognised the Privy Council as the paramount court. What is the clause as it now is? The clause as amended is this:—

> "No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council from a decision of the High Court upon any question howsoever arising as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State or States or as to the limits inter se of the constitutional powers of any two or more States, unless the High Court shall certify that the question is one which ought to be determined by Her Majesty in Council. The High Court may so certify if satisfied that for any special reason the certificate should be granted, and thereupon an appeal shall lie to Her Majesty in Council on the question without further leave."

Now, what is the result of that? The result of that is this—and it has not yet I think been stated to the House. The result is to do away absolutely with the exercise of the Queen's prerogative in every one of the cases coming within that exception. It cuts down the prerogative of the Queen. It is not that it leaves it open to the Queen by those who advise her to say whether any appeal shall or not be permitted, but it makes it impossible for the Queen to grant permission in such a case. You will recollect that in order to make it quite clear that this is the effect upon the prerogative of the Queen, the clause goes on to say—

"Except as provided in this section, this Constitution shall not impair any right which the Queen may be pleased to exercise by virtue of Her Royal prerogative to grant special leave of appeal from the High Court to Her Majesty in Council."

What is the consequence of that? The first observation I make is this—and I speak upon the authority of those more conversant with the matter than I can pretend to be—that these so-called constitutional questions arise much more frequently in Canada as between the Dominion Parliament and the Parliaments of the Provinces, or between the Parliaments of the Provinces themselves than between the Dominion Parliament and the Imperial Parliament. All those questions are now cut out of appeal.

*Lord JAMES of HEREFORD: Except by leave.

*Lord RUSSELL of KILLOWEN: Yes! but leave of the High Court, not of the Privy Council. I most heartily agree in the observation of my noble and learned friend near me (Lord Davey) that one would have thought that the very class of question as to the limits of constitutional power as between the Commonwealth and the States, or as between the States inter se, were eminently the class of cases which it was desirable from every point of view should be determined by a tribunal which stood aloof and apart from all questions of local interest and local prejudice. The third and last point to which I will call attention is this. While there is no appeal according to this clause from the High Court, except by leave of that Court, in the cases mentioned, there is an appeal from the decision of the State Court to the Queen in Council, and thereupon arises the conflict to which reference has been made—which Court is to prevail? I do not seek to dogmatise upon this matter, as to which there are obviously, from what my noble and learned friend has said, different opinions; but I fail to see anything in this Bill asserting directly or indirectly that where the decision of the Privy Council conflicts with the decision of the High Court the decision of the Privy Council is to prevail. I see nothing to that effect expressed certainly, and nothing I think to be implied. When I remind your Lordships that the clause expressly says that the High Court shall be the final judge in the matter unless it chooses to give leave, surely that does lay a solid and reasonable foundation for the contention that it is thereby, as regards matters so dealt with in the clause, created the final Court, and therefore co-ordinate with the other final Court—namely, the Privy Council. It seems to me that that is a difficulty which will very likely arise. The High Court may well say, "We are co-ordinate in this matter, for the Imperial Parliament has said to us, 'You are to deal with it finally, unless you see some reason why you should not allow it to go further.'" Let me put an illustration. The High Court has dealt with a question coming before it in favour of a particular litigant; a question of a cognate character has arisen in another State Court, and that goes to the Privy Council; the Privy Council takes a different view. I think it is very doubtful how effect is to be given to that view by the High Court or in Australia. But suppose that in the province the decision of the High Court has been acted upon, rights adjudicated upon, interests transferred under that decision, how is all that to be undone? It seems to me that the conflict is inevitable. I admit that in other cases, outside the classes of cases as to which the High Court has exclusive jurisdiction, I think there is ground for saying that the Privy Council is the paramount controlling Court; but in the case I have put I cannot help thinking that difficulty may arise. I will only trouble your Lordships with this concluding observation. As a Home Ruler, which I am—I may be allowed to profess it in these days when it is not so popular as it once was—as a Home Ruler I rejoice at this Bill; I am delighted to see that the fullest powers are given to Australia to work out its own destiny by its own methods, and I have no doubt that it will be able to work out that destiny and fulfil it in complete harmony with the great interests of the Empire.

*Viscount KNUTSFORD: I will not detain your Lordships for more than two minutes, but as I may not be able to be present at other stages of this Bill, I would like to say one word upon it, as one who has a genuine interest in the question, and who, whether in office or out of office, has constantly urged upon Australian statesmen that they should endeavour to find a solution of these difficulties. The last speaker said that in some points of view this debate is not real; but I can assure him—and I am speaking for every noble Lord present now—that as to our satisfaction at this great question having been settled the debate is very real indeed. The difficulties in arriving at a solution of the many questions were very great—indeed, perhaps they have hardly been appreciated by those in this country who have not studied colonial questions. At one time there was, no doubt, an impatience of the delay, and a fear that the difficulties might not be overcome. In one sense it is a good thing, perhaps, that there has been that delay, because it is a good omen that this great Commonwealth has been established by law in a year in which the colonies have shown their sympathy with the mother country, and their loyalty to the Empire, and it is therefore not, perhaps, to be regretted that there has been some delay and some prolonged consideration of the question. Then, my Lords, the only other observation I would make is this. We all wish God-speed to the new Commonwealth, not only in their own interests but in the interests of the Empire; and if good sense and conciliatory spirit and toleration are shown in the management of the Commonwealth as they have been shown in getting over and solving the detailed difficulties in the course of the discussions in Australia and in this country, I am quite satisfied that there can be no doubt of the success of the Commonwealth. I for one most heartily desire that that success shall be complete.

*LORD BRASSEY: My Lords, if I venture to add two words it is because the last Convention, to whose labours we owe the Commonwealth Bill, was held in Melbourne, and I am reluctant to allow the opportunity to pass by of bearing to your Lordships the testimony of an eye-witness to the patriotic spirit, the ability, the patience, the mutual forbearance, and the entire absence of party spirit which marked all the proceedings of that Convention.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Tuesday next.

MINES (PROHIBITION OF CHILD LABOUR UNDERGROUND) BILL.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

LORD BELPER: My Lords, I have been asked by the Home Office to call attention to the fact that some drafting Amendments were put into this Bill by the Standing Committee. There was no opportunity then of considering these, but the Home Office have since considered them, and practically the points which they dealt with have been considered before, and the Home Office do not consider that these Amendments are necessary, although they probably will do no harm. I must point out that there are several errors in them which would have to be amended, and therefore, as I understand, the noble Earl in charge of the Bill would approve of them being left out. I shall beg to move that the last clause, Clause 3, which was put in in the Standing Committee, be omitted and also the schedule.

EARL GREY: I quite agree with the noble Lord.

Amendments made; Bill to be read 3ª on Monday next.

BURIAL GROUNDS BILL.

COLONIAL SOLICITORS BILL.

MILITARY LANDS BILL [H.L.].

[THIRD READING.]

Bill read 3a (according to Order).

*LORD THRING: In moving the Amendment which stands in my name I shall say but very few words, and I am conscious that they will probably be of very little effect. What I have done is this. I have put in a schedule the contents of eighteen lines of the Bill; in other words, I have fully explained in the schedule the whole of the clauses which are in fact embodied by reference in the Bill. I myself had great difficulty in discovering what the clauses were, and I admit that it was on the authority of one of the officials employed by the noble Lord who kindly aided me by his direction, that I believe that they are accurately described. I admit that I could not make out the elaborate clauses that were referred to. I also admit that what the Chairman of Committees said was correct, that a great many of these clauses ought to have been put in the Bill, but if I had put them in the Bill it would have required the Bill to be entirely recast, and I had no time to do it. What I have done is to endeavour to make what I think is extremely intricate plain, and I hope I have succeeded. With respect to the substance of the Bill, it is this. A county has a right to pass a resolution that it requires to hire land by compulsion. It is has passed this resolution, the resolution is sent to the Local Government Board; the Local Government Board, if no objection is made, may pass it into law—they may make an order, and it becomes law. If an objection is made, then they have to direct a local inquiry, and, according to that local inquiry, they may or may not pass it into law. Therefore, it must be obvious to your Lordships that the proceeding is somewhat drastic. I think it must be obvious that it ought to be plainly put out in the Bill what that procedure is. With respect to the principle of the Bill, I think it is extremely desirable that rifle ranges should be encouraged. I make no objection to the principle of the Bill, although it gives unusual powers, but what I still object to is that the nature of those powers should be concealed under a cloud of words which I, although I think I may claim to be somewhat of an authority in the matter of referential clauses, was perfectly unable to unfold.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 3, page 2, line 5, to leave out from 'and the' to the end of the clause, and insert 'and for the purpose of carrying such resolution into effect the provisions contained in the schedule hereto shall apply as they were enacted in the body of this Act.'"—(The Lord Thring.)

*THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: It will, perhaps, save the time of your Lordships if I immediately follow my noble friend and explain my own position. I am not qualified to form any opinion as to whether the schedule which the noble Lord has introduced is a proper and correct interpretation of the law, but what I do want to call your Lordships' attention to is this, that under this Bill land can be compulsorily taken from any owner on the initiation of the county council and hired compulsorily for thirty-five years. Now, my Lord, as most of the land in the neighbourhood of London which is desirable for building purposes is high land, and naturally the land which is hired, great injustice might be done when the land is taken, and after such land had been taken such land became useful for building operations. Let us see what the effect of the Bill as it now stands would be. A council could compel an owner to lease his land for thirty-five years. That owner at the time might not be able to show in any definite and distinct way that such land could be used for building purposes. Who would have been able to foresee the enormous development of Woking, Guildford, and other towns near London, or, indeed, near any other large centres of population in the provinces? What I think would meet the exigencies of the case would be if your lordships are prepared to accept the principle of compulsory hiring—which I do not discuss now, but having accepted that, then provide that such an owner should have the power in the same way as is given under the Act of 1894, which is referred to in this Act, to resume possession of his land where such land came in for building purposes. The owner has now that power where such land can be used for mining purposes. It must also be borne in mind that such resumption would not be arbitrarily or vexatiously undertaken, because first, he would have to satisfy the Local Government Board, and secondly, he would have to pay such compensation as the Local Government Board might determine—first of all as the Council and he might agree, or failing agreement, as an arbitrator might direct. All it seems to me that I am asking for—and I am sure it is a point that is of the greatest importance—is that an owner should not have his land taken away from him and perhaps the value of his property enormously deteriorated by being unable to part with his land for thirty-five years without any power to resume it again under totally different circumstances.

LORD THRING: I ought to have explained to your Lordships that there were two exceptions that had been added to this clause; first, that a person injuriously affected as well as the person interested in the land should be able to appear; and, secondly, there is a clause that the landlord might resume the land if he wanted it for building purposes in the same way as he might under the incorporated clause resume it for mining.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): I regret the trouble to which the House and my noble friend have been put owing to this clause. I can assure him that far from desiring to offer obstinate resistance to his proposal I should have been very glad indeed to meet him and to accept his schedule if I could have been convinced that that schedule correctly represented the law as it stands without any material alteration of language. But, my Lords, I have only to-day received from the Local Government Board, which Department I need not say is largely concerned in the administration of these Acts, a memorandum which I will not attempt to read to the House, but which goes to show that the schedule of the noble Lord is not one which could be safely added to the Bill. The Department has sent me a proof of the noble Lord's schedule annotated in blue ink with the Amendments which would be necessary in order to effect the minimum of alteration to bring it into conformity with established practice, and those Amendments are extremely numerous. The memorandum goes on to say that the schedule contains a number of passages which import a wider meaning than the words of the existing law have been given; the omissions are enumerated; the fourteenth section is described as being certainly an incomplete version of Section 1 of the incorporated Act, and in conclusion I am advised that the schedule cannot at present be regarded as a workable substitute for Clause 3 of the Bill. My Lords, I am afraid that in the face of that strong expression of expert opinion I cannot possibly accept the schedule of my noble friend, but I cannot help thinking that my noble friend, and perhaps some other Members of the House, have altogether over-estimated the danger to which owners of land will be exposed under the provisions of this Bill. It is not the case that the passing of this Bill will enable persons to come forward in the guise of those free selectors of whom we heard earlier in the evening to place rifle ranges in the middle of a private estate. The noble Earl told the House that this Bill would put it absolutely into the hands of County Councils to deal with this question.

*THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: What I said was that the County Council could hire land compulsorily from the landlord, and he would have no power to resume for building purposes such as he would have now in the case of minerals.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: Quite so, but the matter does not rest, as the noble Earl supposes, with the County Council. This is what happens. The parish council has to move first. The parish council has first to try to hire by agreement. If the parish council fails to hire by agreement it may represent the case to the County Council, then the County Council go to the Standing Committee for allotments, and after that a public inquiry is held in the parish.

LORD THRING: May I interrupt the noble Marquess? The parish council have nothing on earth to do with it.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am reciting the procedure followed in the case of the compulsory hiring of allotments.

LORD THRING: I was misled in exactly the same way, but I can assure the noble Marquess that under the Bill the parish council has nothing on earth to do with the matter.

*THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH: The County Council certainly has.

LORD THRING: Yes, but not the parish council; that is one of the very traps that I myself fell into.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: Let us begin then with the County Council. The County Council holds a public inquiry; then there is an opportunity to any person interested to memorialise. The Order is deposited with the Local Government Board, and if a memorial has been presented and not withdrawn, then the Local Government Board in its turn proceeds to hold a local inquiry, after which the Order may be confirmed. So that really the rights of the private owner are hedged in by a whole series of inquiries, inquiries which must take considerable time, during which any person aggrieved will have ample opportunity of stating his grievances. I cannot, I am afraid, after the warning I have received, accept this Amendment, but the Bill of course has to pass through the other House of Parliament, and I have no doubt that before it becomes law the point which my noble friend has raised will be considered and properly discussed.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): I am not surprised to hear that my noble friend behind me (the Marquess of Lansdowne) after the report he has received from the Local Government Board feels himself unable to accept the Amendment of the noble Lord opposite. I somewhat regret it, because, even if it did not actually follow the present procedure with regard to allotments, I should have preferred to see some procedure laid down in the Bill which would make it clear to everyone what was intended. In this case the parish council has nothing whatever to do with the matter at all. It is the council of the borough or the council of the county. They make their own inquiries, and as the noble Lord said there is an appeal to the Local Government Board, but only one appeal. The question of compulsory hiring is an entirely new principle, except with regard to allotments, and compulsory hiring for a rifle range is a very different thing to hiring a few acres for an allotment. It extends over a much larger area, and, therefore, I think it should be carefully guarded. The question of injuriously affecting is one that ought to be carefully considered in allowing this compulsory hiring for rifle ranges. Then with regard to what my noble friend the Earl of Portsmouth said as to the land possibly becoming available for building purposes, I think that also requires some consideration. The point is not whether building is going on at the present time; it is whether in the course of the thirty-five years land which was when the hiring commenced possibly waste land, becomes within that time a large building area. Such a contingency is quite possible, and I think there should be some provision, with careful restrictions, to enable the land to be resumed if it is required for building, in the same way that it can be resumed now if minerals are under it. I venture to call the noble Marquess's attention to those two questions, which I think are deserving of his consideration.

On Question, whether to agree to the said Amendment, their Lordships divided:—Contents, 2; Not-Contents, 11.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT OPERATIONS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): May I ask whether the Government have received any news from China.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Her Majesty's Consul at Tientsin telegraphs that the British losses in Admiral Seymour's force which arrived 26th June, together with relief force, were as follows—

"Captain Beyts, R.M.A., killed, seven officers wounded, twenty-four men killed, ninety-one wounded. Returns from foreign detachments not yet completed, but total is stated to be sixty-two killed, 212 wounded."

Various reports have reached the Government as to the positions of the Legations, but the most recent one points to their being still in Peking.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—RESUMPTION OF INDUSTRIAL OPERATIONS IN THE TRANSVAAL.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been directed to the telegram, dated 8th June, to the Colonial Office from Sir Alfred Milner, in which it is stated that the Chamber of Mines, whose headquarters is at Cape Town, has agreed upon 580 representatives of leading mining and other companies, who will proceed to Johannesburg as soon as Lord Roberts can receive them, and that as many banking and other commercial representatives as possible will accompany them; will he say if a representative of the African Bank will be among them, specially privileged to enter Johannesburg; and, on what ground special facilities will be afforded to the representatives of the capitalist bodies of returning to Johannesburg, while British mining operatives have been warned that they cannot return to Johannesburg for a considerable time, and that they will be detained in their journey from England to the Transvaal at South African ports.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): (1) The substance of the telegram was communicated to the newspapers by my instructions. (2) I do not know. (3) The answer to the last paragraph of the question is contained in the telegram from Sir A. Milner to which the hon. Member refers. It is clearly inexpedient to allow large numbers of persons seeking employment to return to Johannesburg until military demands upon transport and supply become less urgent, and until the representatives of the great industries, such as managers, engineers, etc., have made the arrangements necessary before the industries of the place can be re-established.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman instruct Sir A. Milner to take care that the places once occupied by whites are not filled by blacks?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I do not think any such instructions are necessary.

HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS.

*MR. FABER (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that since the commencement of the war in South Africa 127 officers and 4,260 men have died of disease there, and 844 officers and 17,666 men have been invalided home from causes other than wounds, he will state what steps have been taken to provide for the stationary and field hospitals being properly equipped with medical officers and attendants and appliances for dealing with cases of disease, and on whom the duty of providing for the equipment of such hospitals primarily rests, and who are responsible for their organisation; and whether he can state approximately how many officers and men are now ill in hospital in South Africa from causes other than wounds.

The following questions also appeared on the Paper:—

COLONEL PILKINGTON (Southport): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the reports of the insanitary condition of the military hospitals at the seat of war owing to the want of accommodation, overcrowding, and the lack of proper medical comforts, and to the fact that the hospital nurses on the spot are unable to carry out their duties owing to the want of orderlies to render them efficient aid; and whether it is possible to do more than is being done at the present moment to limit contagion and render the possibility of the recovery of wounded and sick soldiers more probable.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state how many military surgeons and how many civil surgeons have been employed in the campaign in South Africa, and how many male attendants and how many female nurses have been employed in the several hospitals of the Royal Army Medical Department, and how many doctors, attendants, and nurses in the hospitals on land and water provided by private munificence, and how many beds were available on 1st June for the forces under Field Marshal Lord Roberts in Cape Colony and Natal; and can he give any information to the House as to the supply of medical comforts to South Africa on the outbreak of the war and during its course.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. WYNDHAM, Dover): The debate this afternoon will be the proper occasion for a full discussion of the various questions raised, but I may say in general that for each increase of the force in South Africa a proportionate increase of medical staff and medical stores has been made. There are now in South Africa, according to our latest information, 466 Army medical officers and 440 civilian surgeons, 566 female nurses, and 5,668 male nurses and orderlies. These do not include doctors and nurses engaged in South Africa. The supply of beds was, on the 19th instant, 5,000 in Natal and 13,600 in Cape Colony and other parts; total, 18,600 beds in South Africa.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Do these figures include the doctors and nurses of purely private hospitals?

*MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, they include everything in the shape of local hospitals, nurses, and doctors.

MR. FABER: And what about the last paragraph of my question?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I think it will be more convenient to deal with that in the course of the debate.

SIR WALTER FOSTER'S SUGGESTION FOR A SANITARY COMMISSION.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, in October last, he received a letter from the hon. Member for Ilkeston pointing out that in all probability great loss of life from fever and other maladies more or less preventible by careful sanitary work was likely to occur in the South African campaign, and suggesting the appointment of a small sanitary commission, or a commissioner and assistants, to proceed to South Africa to assist the Army medical officers in preventing the dangers referred to; whether the hon. Member offered to place his services and his experience as a physician and as secretary of the Local Government Board during the last invasion of cholera at the disposal of the War Office in an unpaid capacity; and whether the suggestion and offer were declined by the Secretary of State on the ground that the need of special assistance was not the same in sanitary matters as in surgical operations.

*Mr. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir. The facts are as stated. Army surgeons are not in constant practice as operators; and therefore the Secretary of State was very glad to avail himself of the patriotic offers made by Sir W. MacCormac, Mr. Treves, and other specially skilled surgeons. But Army medical officers have special training in sanitation of camps and the management of diseases incidental to field service, and abundant opportunities of obtaining experience in these matters. It did not, therefore, appear that there was any occasion for the appointment of such a sanitary commission as the hon. Member suggested.

ARMY MEDICAL DEPARTMENT—REORGANISATION COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

*Sir CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the Report of the Departmental Committee, which was sitting in 1898, on the Reorganisation of the Army Medical Department was presented to Parliament; and, if not, whether the portion of it which bears on organisation for war can now be laid before Parliament.

*Mr. WYNDHAM: The Committee to which the right hon. Baronet refers only considered the titles to be given to the corps and to the officers, and the command to be exercised by the officers. No question of organisation came before it.

UNWOUNDED SOLDIERS DEAD OR INVALIDED HOME.

Mr. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War when the Return asked for on 28th May and granted by the Government, of the number of officers and men who since the commencement of the present war have died or been invalided home from causes other than wounds received in action, will be laid upon the Table of the House.

*Mr. WYNDHAM: Full information on these matters has only just reached the War Office. The Return is now being compiled, and it is hoped will shortly be presented.

PROVISION FOR INVALIDED SOLDIERS—APPEALS TO CHARITY IN KERRY.

Mr. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is aware that a public appeal has been made in the press by Colonel Johnston, commanding 101st regimental district, at Tralee, county Kerry, asking for assistance for soldiers now living in different portions of Kerry who were invalided home after being wounded in the South African war; whether this appeal was made owing to the fact that in many cases the invalided soldiers received no pension, and in other cases the pension granted is insufficient to keep the men out of the workhouse; and whether the Government will take such steps as may be necessary to prevent those South African soldiers from becoming a burden on the ratepayers of Kerry.

*Mr. WYNDHAM: All cases of discharge on account of disability are submitted to the commissioners of Chelsea Hospital for the award of pensions. Every soldier whose disability is due to service is entitled to a pension varying in the case of privates from 6d. to 2s. 6d. a day, according to the nature of the disability. The Government has no reason to suppose that the ratepayers of Kerry will be burdened in the manner suggested.

Mr. FLAVIN: Will the hon. Gentleman answer the question as to the truth of the statement that Colonel Johnston has made a public appeal for assistance of this sort?

*MR. WYNDHAM: We know nothing about it.

MR. FLAVIN: But did he make the appeal?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman says he knows nothing about it.

RELEASED BRITISH TROOPS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can say when will the roll of the non-commissioned officers and men who have been released from imprisonment as prisoners of war in South Africa be published, and why have the names of the men been so long withheld from publication.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The names of the non-commissioned officers and men, prisoners of war, who were released at Pretoria have not yet been forwarded. Lord Roberts has been requested to supply the information.

ROODEVAAL ENGAGEMENT, 7TH JUNE —CAPTURE OF THE DERBYSHIRES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the War Office authorities have any and, if so, what explanation to offer of the fact that the news of the defeat and capture of the 4th battalion of the Derbyshire Regiment at Roodevaal on the 7th June was known in Derby on the evening of Sunday, 10th June, but was not known in London till the evening of 11th June.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir. Rumours are frequently current in advance of an official telegram, and this seems to have been a case of the kind.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is it not the fact that the news was known in Derby on Sunday, and at the Stock Exchange on Monday before the War Office published it?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The information reached the War Office late on Sunday, but we had to verify certain matters before we published it.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: But——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must remind the hon. Member that he asked for an explanation and the hon. Gentleman replied that he had none. That is an answer to the question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: And a most unsatisfactory one, Sir.

PAY OF COLONIAL TROOPS.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War how many Colonial troops in South Africa are having as much as 5s. a day in pay and allowances, and why a difference is made in the rate of pay between British and Colonial troops.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The number is about 22,000. The question was fully discussed on the 1st of February in debate.†

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Cannot the hon. Gentleman give me an answer to the question on the Paper?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have said the question was fully discussed in Committee of Supply, and it is impossible to reduce the discussion to the limits of an answer to a question.

THE 4TH SURREY REGIMENT.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will explain why, after the 4th Surrey Regiment volunteered for the front on 16th February, and was ordered to embark on 23rd February, and after 200 men not yet embodied had joined, officers had provided themselves with field equipment, and the service clothing of the battalion had been issued, an order was received on 22nd February cancelling the embarkation; and why this expense was incurred.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The expense of preparing the battalion for field service was incurred because the battalion was put under orders. These orders were cancelled because two serious cases occurred indicating a want of discipline in the battalion, and the Commander-in-Chief did not consider it advisable to allow the battalion to proceed on service.

VOLUNTEER CORPS—TRAINING AND OUTFIT ALLOWANCES.

MR. COLSTON (Gloucestershire, Thornbury): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he will grant the allowance in aid of outfit, of an amount not exceeding £100, to those Departmental officers who voluntarily placed their services at their country's disposal during the great pressure of the South African War, but who, being Volunteers, are not entitled to claim the allowance. I beg also to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he can now redeem the undertaking given by him to the effect that the Secretary of State for War was prepared to consider any special cases in which it could be shown that Volunteer corps had been put to expense in connection with the billeting and messing of their service companies during their period of training; and, whether, as the Wiltshire Volunteer Service Company was involved in a special expenditure of £502 owing to no barrack accommodation being provided for them, that sum can now be refunded from public sources.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I hope to be able to answer both these questions shortly.

REORGANISATION OF THE MILITARY FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

MR. DRAGE (Derby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any attempt has been made to ascertain the views of the Colonial and Indian Governments on the reorganisation of the military force of the Empire; and whether the Government will consider the desirability of adding to the Committee of the Council of Defence representatives of the great self-governing colonies and of India.

*MR. WYNDHAM: This is hardly a question to be answered by the War Office. It is rather one of policy, which should be addressed to the Leader of the House.

NETLEY HOSPITAL—COCOA FOR PATIENTS.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether officers of the Royal Army Medical Corps are not allowed to prescribe cocoa for patients at Netley Hospital, and whether they are surcharged if they order it without the sanction of the War Office.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Cocoa is not supplied for ordinary diets, but it can be ordered as an extra by any medical officer who considers it advisable without any surcharge.

ARMY HEAD-DRESS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the attention of the War Office authorities has been directed to the order issued by the general officer commanding at Salisbury Plain, in which officers commanding battalions whose men have caps only are recommended to make arrangements for the supply of cap covers or cheap white or khaki caps which should be paid for out of the institute funds; and whether, having regard to the fact that the regimental institute funds practically belong to the soldiers and should be expended entirely for their benefit, it will be provided that the ultimate cost of procuring suitable equipments for the troops should not fall upon the institute funds.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Such orders are not approved. The order in question has been cancelled.

ALDERSHOT MANŒUVRES—HEAT CASUALTIES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether all the men on parade at Aldershot on the Field Day on 11th June, when twenty-eight men, of whom four died, were severely affected, and twenty-nine men were slightly affected, by the heat of the sun, had breakfasted before they came on parade, and were the casualties on this occasion confined to non-commissioned officers and men; can he state if the breakfast consisted of tea and of dry bread, or were there any, and, if so, what additions; and how many ounces of bread were allowed for each man for breakfast on that day; and will he say, out of the 18,002 men on parade at Aldershot on 11th June, how many were left without food from their departure from barracks till their return to barracks or to hospital on that day; and whether the attention of the War Office authorities has been directed to the strictures made by the coroner at the inquest on the body of one of the soldiers who lost his life in those operations with reference to sending out men on a scanty breakfast, which he termed almost brutal, and the rider to the verdict, that the men should have had a substantial breakfast; and have the War Office authorities any, and, if so, what explanation to make for a course of conduct calculated to endanger the health and lives of the troops.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member was absent when these matters were fully discussed.† All the men had breakfast before starting. The casualties were not confined to the men, as two officers fell out. The breakfast would include additions, which vary in different regiments. The daily free issue of bread is one pound, and this is seldom consumed, but more can be obtained if required. In the case of two battalions the men were without food from the time they left barracks until they returned. The food was despatched from barracks, but failed to reach the troops.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is the hon. Gentleman aware it was sworn at the inquest that one man had nothing but dry bread?

*MR. WYNDHAM: There were two battalions that had no food. I can assure the hon. Member the whole matter is being fully gone into.

MILITIA OFFICERS' PENSIONS.

MR. YOUNGER (Lincolnshire, Stamford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, having regard to the fact that there are a certain number of officers of Militia of the rank of major and upwards who are now serving during the period of embodiment of their regiments, who are entitled to retired pay, and who are past the age of compulsory service in the Reserve, and that those officers are subjected to a deduction from their pay equal to their pension, whether, as their pension is for past service, and as they are not liable through having passed the limit of age to be called upon to serve, he will take steps to remove what is felt to be a hardship to officers who are now holding responsible positions in regiments of Militia which are at present embodied.

*MR. WYNDHAM: All Militia officers are under a compulsory liability to serve on embodiment. The Secretary of State is not prepared to alter the rule that no officer may draw full pay and retired pay at the same time.

MR. YOUNGER: But is there any reason why these Militia officers should be on a different footing to other Army officers serving with the Militia? Is it not provided under an Army order dated April this year that they shall draw their pensions without any deductions?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I do not think the hon. Member quite appreciates the fact that an officer in the Militia has accepted service with the Militia whenever embodied, and therefore he is obviously on an entirely different footing.

LONDON TELEGRAPHIST VOLUNTEERS—CAMP LEAVE.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, in view of the Government appeal to private employers to give facilities to their workmen for attending Volunteer camps, the Postmaster General will consider the advisability and policy of setting an example in this particular by now giving to the telegraphists of the Central Office, London, who are Volunteers, permission to attend the Aldershot camp for training purposes, which has hitherto been refused.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): Every effort will be made to release as many Volunteers as possible for the purpose of attending camp. But the months of July and August are the periods of the greatest pressure in the Central Telegraph Office, which has already lost a large number of men by reason of the war in South Africa; and it is, of course, a matter of the first importance to prevent any possibility of a breakdown in the telegraph service.

NAVY — WATER-TUBE BOILERS — BREAKDOWN OF THE T.B.D. "SKATE."

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, can he give the House any information as to the breakdown of the torpedo boat destroyer "Skate," which left Plymouth on 7th May for Gibraltar, under convoy of Her Majesty's ship "Minerva"; did the "Skate's" foremost boiler give out soon after the vessels had entered the Bay of Biscay; did her other three boilers break down shortly afterwards; and was she thus so completely crippled that it was found necessary for the "Minerva" to take her in tow; did the towing hawser part a few hours afterwards; was the "Skate" lost sight of owing to the darkness of the night, and the heavy sea; and did she remain, in her helpless state, shipping heavy seas and in danger of foundering, from 10 p.m on the 9th May, till 8 a.m. on the 10th May, when she was again discovered and taken in tow by the "Minerva"; and has the "Skate" suffered so much that it has been found, on her arrival at Gibraltar, impossible to send her to sea again until she has been provided with new boilers; and were her boilers water-tube boilers, and, if so, of what type.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The "Skate" left Plymouth with the "Minerva" on May 8th, and was taken in tow by that ship on the 9th, because the engines had to be stopped owing to the rolling of the vessel bringing the circulating inlets out of the water. She was either cast off or the hawser carried away some time during the evening, and the "Minerva" remained by her during the night and took her in tow again the next morning. She was again cast off at 4 p.m., and proceeded to Vigo under her own steam. After leaving Vigo her boilers were damaged, and the "Minerva" towed her to Gibraltar. Three of her boilers will have to be re-tubed. I have not yet got complete information from Gibraltar. She has small tube water-tube boilers of the Blechynden type.

MR. WOLFF (Belfast, E.): Were these the Belleville boilers?

MR. GOSCHEN: No, they were not Belleville boilers, but small tube water boilers of a totally different kind.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the right hon. Gentleman publish any further information on the subject?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes, Sir, when I receive it.

CIUDAD BOLIVAR—MURDER OF MR. JAMES LYELL.

MR. PIKE PEASE (Darlington): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he has received the Report in reference to the murder of Mr. James Lyell, at Ciudad Bolivar, and can he state whether the murderer has been executed.

MR. BRODRICK: The investigation into the circumstances connected with the murder of Mr. Lyell is still proceeding, and is being watched by Her Majesty's Consul at Ciudad Bolivar. In a telegram recently received Her Majesty's Chargé d'Affaires at Caracas reports that he has strongly urged the Venezuelan Government to accelerate proceedings in the case.

MR. PIKE PEASE: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this murder took place as far back as February last? Is it not time for the Government to press for the execution of the murderer?

[No answer was given.]

EGYPT—DURATION OF BRITISH OCCUPATION.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether it is intended that the occupation of Egypt shall be permanent, and if it is not so intended, whether Her Majesty's Government can now state at what date the occupation is likely to cease.

MR. BRODRICK: Her Majesty's Government have nothing at present to add to the declarations which have been publicly made by them and by their predecessors in regard to the policy of this country in Egypt.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Is the Khedive visiting this country because he wants us to clear out of his country?

UGANDA—COMPENSATION TO FRENCH CATHOLICS.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the sum of £10,000, voted in March, 1899, by the House of Commons, after negotiations with the French Government, in compensation of claims on the part of certain Roman Catholics in Uganda in respect of injuries alleged to have been done to their clothing and property by British forces, was paid over to the French Government or to Cardinal Vaughan.

MR. BRODRICK: The sum in question was paid to the injured parties through Cardinal Vaughan.

ASHANTI—SUGGESTED RESTORATION OF KING PREMPEH.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can say what has become of King Prempeh; and whether, in view of the condition of affairs in Ashanti, the Government will consider the advisability of restoring the King that he may use his influence for the pacification of his people.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: Prempeh is at present in Sierra Leone. The question of his being restored to Ashanti cannot be entertained.

ASHANTI—NATIVE RISING—INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he can give the House any information as to the relief of Coomassie.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No news has been received since that which was published in the newspapers yesterday morning.

HARBOUR DOCK AND PIER SCHEMES—EXEMPTION OF GOVERNMENT DEPARTMENTS FROM DOCK RATES.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, will he explain under what authority the Treasury are now requiring the promoters of private Bills for the construction or extension of harbours, docks, and piers to insert in such Bills clauses extending the provisions of Section 28 of the General Act, 10 and 11 Vic., cap. 27, to other Government Departments than those specially exempted by that section from the payment of dock rates or duties; and to what Government Departments or Government services such power is held to extend.

MR. HANBURY: The Treasury represents to Parliament on behalf of the executive Government the desirability of inserting these clauses, and Parliament has constantly seen fit to insert them. In 1899, for example, they appeared in thirteen Acts and six Provisional Orders under the Board of Trade, and this year six Acts containing them have already received the Royal Assent. They will apply to all Government Departments.

NORTH DEVON TELEPHONIC SYSTEM.

SIR CAMERON GULL (Devonshire, Barnstaple): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he can state when the provisional agreement between the Postmaster General and the National Telephone Company as to the extension of the trunk telephone line to North Devon, which was made last autumn, will be finally sanctioned and the promised extension made.

MR. HANBURY: The work necessary for the connection of Barnstaple and Ilfracombe with the trunk wire system has been authorised by the Treasury, 31st May, and will be completed as rapidly as possible.

LONDON TELEPHONE SERVICE.

MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he can now say when the Post Office will be ready to supply telephone service in the London district from their exchange, and when the tariff and conditions will be published.

MR. HANBURY: The construction of the underground system of wires for the Post Office telephone exchanges is proceeding as rapidly as possible in various parts of London, and it is hoped to complete a part of the system about the end of the present year. The rates of subscription and conditions of service will be published as soon as the Postmaster General is able to give a definite date for the opening of the central exchange.

GREAT NORTH OF IRELAND RAILWAY—SUTTON-HOWTH TRAMWAY.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Great Northern Railway (Ireland) Act, 1897, empowered the company to lay a tramway to Howth along the public road from Sutton to Censure and along the Bailey Road, but that the company, instead of laying a tramway along the public road, built a tramroad between those points on lands acquired from private owners, and raised the some a foot above the public road, but without fencing it off for the safety of the public or providing for surface drainage; whether, considering that the Irish Courts have decided that there is an essential difference between a tramroad and a tramway, one being part of the road available for public traffic and the other being a railway, the road authority has power to sanction such deviation from the powers of the Act under Section 20, as the company allege; is any agreement under that section as to construction between the company and the road authority to be subject to the provisions of the Act, and confined to tramways along or across any street or road; do the Board of Trade maintain that such an agreement is within the competence of the parties, and have the Board of Trade been asked to sanction a departure from Section 9 of the Act, which provides that the tramways shall be laid and maintained in such a manner that the surface of the rails shall be on a level with the surface of the carriage way of the road along which same is laid; and whether, as the line is not to be opened for public traffic without a certificate from the Board of Trade, such certificate will be granted until the law is complied with.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): I am aware that, at the request of the road authority, the railway company proposed to lay the tramway along the side of the road instead of on the road itself. The Board of Trade informed the company that the Department had no power to authorise such a deviation from the authorised line, but that as the alteration was made at the request of the road authority they would not refuse to inspect the line if so made. It is clear that the company should take the earliest convenient opportunity of obtaining statutory authority for the alteration.

MR. FLAVIN: Is there any power to construct a tramway on a public road?

MR. RITCHIE: Certainly, if authority is given.

CORK AND WATERFORD TELEPHONE SERVICE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the so-called trunk telephone service between Cork and Waterford is not a direct wire but passes through Limerick and Dublin with the result that the delays are such as to make the service useless; and seeing that in England towns so small as Hayle (Cornwall) with only 1,672 inhabitants, Newquay with 1,891 inhabitants, and Llandaff with 3,379, have the advantage of a trunk telephone service, and that in Ireland Tralee (the chief town of county Kerry), Killarney (an important tourist centre), and other important towns, such as Newry, are left without it, whether the Postmaster General will reconsider the representations made to him by the Cork Chamber of Shipping and Commerce as to the necessity for trunk telephonic communication between Cork and Fermoy, Youghal, Mallow, Tralee, and other towns.

MR. HANBURY: Telephone trunk-wire communication between Cork and Waterford is by way of Dublin. There is no break at Limerick. The average number of messages between Cork and Waterford is less than two a day, but the service is a good one. There is not a direct trunk-wire service at Hayle and Llandaff. The nearest offices on the trunk-wire system are at Penzance and Cardiff respectively, and access to that system is obtained through the local exchange systems of the National Telephone Company from Hayle and Llandaff. The extension to North Cornwall and Newquay was made under a guarantee from the National Telephone Company. An extension of the trunk-wire system is now being made to Newry under a similar guarantee, and the Postmaster General has offered on several occasions to extend the system under local or other guarantees to the other towns mentioned in the question.

LOCAL TAXATION COMMISSION—SITTINGS IN IRELAND.

MR. CAREW (Dublin College Green): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is proposed to have any sittings of the Royal Commission on Local Taxation in Ireland, as was arranged last autumn; and will he state what steps have been taken to make public in Ireland the nature and objects of the inquiry, and whether any memorandum or statement has been issued showing the special heads on which evidence would be required irrespective of such local taxation; and whether, in view of the facts that since the establishment of the Commission a new system of local government has been established in Ireland and the incidence of local taxation has been changed, and that upon the Commission as at present constituted there is no member who resides in Ireland or with practical experience of Irish local affairs and administration, the Government will consider the advisability of either appointing a new body of Commissioners to sit in Ireland or of now adding to the existing Commission persons with practical and intimate knowledge of Irish legislation and Irish local government.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I am informed that the Royal Commission on Local Taxation have felt themselves obliged by various circumstances to abandon their proposed meeting in Dublin. The Irish witnesses whom it was intended to hear have been examined in London, and their evidence will shortly be published. The scope of the inquiry it set forth in the terms of reference and has been made known to the public through the medium of advertisements extensively published in the Irish press last year. No further steps have since been taken in the matter. With regard to the second paragraph, I think the time has hardly come for an exhaustive inquiry into the working of the new system of local taxation established in Ireland by the Local Government Act. I may remind the hon. Member that one of the members of the Commission is the hon. and learned Member for East Donegal.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND—ORPEN ESTATE—REFUSAL TO SELL TO TENANTS.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the estate of Jane Sophia Orpen, in the barony of Glanrought, county Kerry, was advertised to be sold in four lots on 20th June, 1900, in the Chancery Division Court, Dublin, and that Mr. William G. Lane, of Cork and Dublin, who had carriage of the sale, attended at Kilgoran and accepted the offer of the tenants who had signed the necessary agreements; whether he is aware that the tenants have been negotiating for some years for the sale of this estate, and that on the day the property was to be sold lots 3 and 4 were sold to a local landlord because his offer was higher than the offer of the tenants, and that on the same day the sale of lots 1 and 2 on the same property was adjourned, although the joint offer of the tenants for lot 1 was £2,185, as against only £1,400 bid by the local landlord, and that for lot 2 the tenants offered £1,495 and the local landlord only £1,200; whether he can state on what grounds lots 3 and 4 were sold to the local landlord; and why were the tenants refused to be made the purchasers of their farms, seeing that their joint offers for lots 1 and 2 were £3,680, as against £2,600 bid by the local landlord.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The facts are generally as stated in the first and second paragraphs, except that as the acceptance of an offer to purchase rests with the court, the solicitor having carriage of the proceedings could not of his own motion accept any offers made by the tenants. Lots 3 and 4 were sold to the local landlord because, in the opinion of the Judge, his offer was more advantageous to the estate than a sale to the tenants. The sale of the other two lots was adjourned as the court was unable to accept the tenants' offer, that being conditional upon the Land Commissioners sanctioning an advance of the necessary amount of land stock.

MR. FLAVIN: Is it not the fact that the joint offer of the tenants was more than that of the local landlord?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I can only repeat the answer I have given that in the opinion of the Judge the landlord's offer was the more advantageous to the estate.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): But ought not the advantage to the tenants to be considered as well as the advantage to the estate?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That does not arise out of the question.

MR. FLAVIN: It was my question.

WARDEN ESTATE—EVICTION OF JOHANNA HUSSEY.

MR. T. J. FARRELL (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a family named Hussey was evicted on the Warden property on 6th June, 1900; and that Johanna Hussey, the wife of the evicted tenant, was also evicted on the same day by the sheriff, bailiffs, and police, notwithstanding the fact that the local dispensary officer stated that this woman was under his medical care, and had given certificates as to her unfitness to be removed or evicted, and also certified that she was a case of quiet mania, and in a debilitated condition; and can he state on what grounds and by whose authority was Johanna Hussey evicted, and whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The eviction of Hussey and his family on the date mentioned was carried out not by the police but by the sub-sheriff, in pursuance of a decree for possession obtained at petty session in April. Prior to the eviction Hussey had obtained a certificate from a doctor that his wife was not in a fit state for removal. The sub-sheriff, however, was accompanied on the occasion by a doctor who examined the woman and certified that she could with safety be removed. Upon the approach of the eviction party it appears that Mrs. Hussey, although fully dressed, was put into bed by one of her daughters, and after the eviction was carried out she ran away from the doctor who had been speaking to her. There is no doubt, I believe, that she is a woman of weak intellect. There is nothing in the matter calling for action on the part of the Government.

MR. FLAVIN put a further question.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: If the hon. Member wishes further information he must put down his question.

BELFAST LUNATIC ASYLUM—CASE OF ELIZA CLINGIN.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been drawn to the particulars of an inquest held in the Belfast Lunatic Asylum on the 15th ultimo, on the remains of an inmate named Eliza Clingin, who was an inmate of the asylum from 1892, and died after long suffering from phthisis; and would he make known to the House the nature of the communication made to the coroner which induced that gentleman to hold an inquest in this case where the cause of death was within the knowledge of the medical and nursing staff of the asylum.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have seen a copy of the verdict of the coroner's jury in this case. As regards the second paragraph, the only communication made to the coroner which induced him to hold the inquest was the ordinary notification sent to the coroner in the case of every death in a district asylum in Ireland within forty-eight hours of the death.

LIGHTS IN LIMERICK PORT.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he would direct attention to the request of the Limerick Harbour Commissioners asking the Irish Lights Commissioners to erect a light on a point on the river Shannon, at Rinmalon, for the advantage of the navigation of the port of Limerick.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This matter has already, I understand, been before the Irish Lights Commissioners, who have informed the harbour authorities that they are unable at present to recommend the establishment of a light at the point mentioned.

IRISH SHEBEENS.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will grant the Return respecting shebeens in certain towns in Ireland standing on to-day's Paper.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: No objection will be raised to the issue of the Return provided the hon. Member will expunge from the form of notice the first portion, which asks for the number of suspected shebeens in the five cities named. The Government could not consent to the publication of information purporting to be based merely on the suspicions entertained by the police. If, therefore, the hon. Member will place an amended form of notice on the Paper, modified as I have suggested, the Return will be granted.

BELFAST LAND COMMISSION APPEALS.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the recent sitting of the Chief Land Commission at Belfast, how many cases of appeals from fair rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners were disposed of by them, and in how many cases were the judicial rents confirmed and reduced and increased respectively; and whether the Chief Commissioners inspected any or all of the holdings, or merely depended upon the reports of the court valuers to guide them in coming to a conclusion.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There were ninety-seven cases listed for hearing before the Chief Land Commission at their recent sitting at Belfast. Of these the rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners were confirmed in fourteen cases; reduced in four; increased in fifty-three; and dismissed in three. Ten cases were withdrawn; seven settled; judgment was reserved in two cases, and four were adjourned. The Chief Commissioners did not view the holdings. They decided the cases in the ordinary way after hearing the evidence adduced on both sides, and after considering the schedule of the particulars recorded by the Sub-Commission and the reports made by the Court valuers.

IRISH LICENCE TRANSFERS—ROCKCORRY CASE.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland if he is aware that Mr. Leslie, agent for the Dartrey estates, in County Monaghan, recently took over the farm and public-house of a tenant, in the townland of Drumgole, and in his own name obtained a transfer of the licence at the Rockcorry petty sessions; and will he bring the action of the magistrates in granting this transfer to Mr. Leslie, a land agent, and justice of the peace for the Rockcorry district, to the notice of the Lord Chancellor.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): In reply to the first part of the question, I beg to refer the hon. Member to the reply of my right hon. friend to a similar question addressed to him by the hon. Member yesterday. As to the second paragraph, as there is nothing censurable in the conduct of the magistrates mentioned, the answer to this question is in the negative.

UNIFICATION OF THE CRIMINAL LAW OF THE EMPIRE.

MR. DRAGE: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government have considered the desirability of unifying the criminal law of the whole Empire on the lines of the Indian Criminal Code and the Draft Code prepared for the United Kingdom by the late Mr. Justice Stephen, and of codifying the law with regard to bills of exchange and the law with regard to bankruptcy; and whether Her Majesty's Government will consider the desirability of appointing a Committee on which the great self-governing colonies shall be represented to prepare draft codes with powers similar to those possessed by the Committee on obsolete Acts of Parliament presided over by the late Lord Herschell.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I am not sufficiently an expert on this subject to be able to give my hon. friend any authoritative pronouncement upon it; but it seems to me that the circumstances of the various parts of the Empire are so different that a universal criminal law applicable to all is almost illusory.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS AND STANDING COMMITTEES.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he has considered the Parliamentary situation arrived at this year of a number of Bills in the hands of private Members having passed a Second Reading and been dealt with by Standing Committees or referred to Standing Committees, at an expenditure of the time and trouble of Members interested, with little chance of being further considered in the House and passed into law; and whether he will make either proposals to alter procedure on such Bills in future sessions, or appoint a Select Committee forthwith to inquire and report what amendments of procedure are desirable to facilitate such legislation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope that the labours of the Standing Committees upon these Bills have not been thrown away, any more than the labours of the Select Committees on such Bills are thrown away. Such discussions usually end in the Bills being brought forward in an amended form on a future occasion. But I am not in a position to pledge myself to appoint a Committee for the purpose of facilitating the progress of private Members' legislation as distinguished from Government legislation. The House of Commons can only sit for a certain number of months in the year, and I think that the bulk of the legislation should be in the hands of the Government rather than in the hands of private Members.

ARMY (SUPPLEMENTARY) ESTIMATE, 1900-1901.

£5, Supplementary, Medical Establishment, Pay, etc.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): I make no complaint, but I own that I am somewhat taken by surprise at finding that the hon. Member for Westminster has not opened this debate. [Opposition cries of "Why?"] I infer that he, having put forward certain statements, desires to hear a reply from the Government without adding anything to them. I have read those statements with the attention which is due to the interest—the absorbing and painful interest—of the subject which the hon. Member has brought to the notice of the public, and also, I say freely, with the attention due to the earnestness with which the hon. Member has been actuated. But I do not propose to follow—and I think it would be almost out of order to do so—his statements point by point in the order in which they have been raised, not in this House but in an organ of the public press. I think my duty to-day, if I construe aright the wishes of the Committee, is to answer, if I can, the question which I believe to be uppermost in the minds of the Committee and of all our countrymen throughout the length and breadth of the land. Unless I misinterpret the wishes of everyone here and in the country, the questions which they wish answered are these. In the first place, are these statements true? In the second place, if they are wholly or even partially true, could the evil which they point to have been avoided either by a keener foresight or by a more lavish provision and expenditure on the part of the Home Government, or by greater zeal and intelligence on the part of our officers, and more especially on the part of the Royal Army Medical Corps, in South Africa? The third question which presses for a reply is this—are those evils now remedied or are they in the course of being remedied? I put these three questions forward, and as the hon. Member did not rise I rose myself, because I thought it right to discuss these questions before any other matters which are more or less germane to the debate are dragged into it. It would be quite easy and even proper to discuss this evening whether the establishment of the Royal Army Medical Corps is adequate or not. Many other questions will occur to hon. Members. But I feel that if these questions were raised before the others were answered I should be led away against my will from the topics which are of vital and immediate moment. They belong to the larger and wider considerations. Whether this Government and its predecessors have properly gauged exactly the military needs of this Empire is a well-worn topic. We have covered that ground before and shall do again. But this afternoon we have to consider whether certain circumstances did or did not happen at a certain spot on a certain day; whether they could be prevented; and whether such events are less likely to happen again by reason of the steps which have since been taken. I answer the first question by saying frankly that to a certain extent—to a lamentable extent—it is true. It is true that our wounded and sick at Bloemfontein have in this campaign, as I believe in every other campaign, been exposed to terrible hardships, the full extent of which has not, perhaps, been always gauged by those who have not seen war. I have no quarrel with the hon. Member, but he must allow me to point out to this Committee the nature of the methods which he has adopted. He has painted a picture of one place at one time, and he has painted the circumstances which occurred there, without hinting at many other facts and at many other things which ought, I think, to have been presented at the same time, in order that a just estimate and judgment might be formed on the matters. That is a legitimate method of bringing a serious evil forward — to paint a picture of it, to make it vivid, and to do it vigorously, so that it strikes the hearts and the feelings of the people. I do not complain of it, but I believe that it is a method more usual in the domain of art than in the domain of sober politics. It would have been open to the hon. Member at the same time to have gone into other details which it will be my duty to put before the Committee this evening. But taking this picture as being to a certain extent—to a great extent—true, I maintain that you cannot get at the full truth unless it is supplemented by other facts and considerations. Now I am called upon to defend, as I have said, the foresight of the Government and the zeal and energy of our officers in South Africa; and in doing that I may seem—for we are all conscious of our own weakness—to make out too good a case and to prove that nobody has been in error Let me begin by disclaiming any such intention. Humanity is liable to error. I have no doubt that it has not been possible for men in this war to do what men have never been able to do in any war; and I am sure that this Government have not been all-wise and specially assisted to avoid all error. But, having said that, I shall have to argue that no stone was left unturned and that no man has spared himself in trying to mitigate, as they have been mitigated, to an extent never attained before in any campaign, what are, after all, the inevitable hardships of war. We are convinced that we have much to learn by experience. It has been the hope and the wish of the Government, openly stated in this House at the beginning of the session—and I beg leave to say that it is the hope and the wish of the Royal Army Medical Corps—to learn by the experience of this war, and also, no doubt, by the inquiry which will be instituted. But as to foresight, is it true that this Government went to war in South Africa without taking account of the possibility of an outbreak of enteric fever on a large scale? I venture to give the facts, and to tell the Committee that long before the war broke out, during last summer, sickness was anticipated in South Africa, and, of course, particularly in the form of dysentery and enteric. The importance of exercising every precaution to prevent it was specially emphasised by the Director-General of the Army Medical Corps in London to all the medical officers who might possibly have to proceed to South Africa. A pamphlet on the sanitary lessons of the recent war between America and Spain, by Surgeon-General Sternberg, was, with the author's permission, reprinted and issued to every medical officer sent to South Africa. In anticipation of the outbreak of hostilities, recommendations were made that each unit of 100 men should be supplied with a sterilising filter; and it was laid down that quicklime should be stored in quantities of one ton to every 1,000 men wherever standing camps were formed, and that it should be constantly issued. Medical officers were urged before the outbreak of the war to ask for anything they might require in addition to the materials at their disposal. There is no case of stinting, of deliberate or careless stinting no case. The medical officers in South Africa have been begged to ask for all they need and the surgeon-generals at home for anything they may require. The Director-General of Ordnance has given all that has been asked for through the quartermasters and the principal ordnance officer in South Africa. Every demand that has been put in has been complied with, and the Treasury has never suggested that we should be otherwise than lavish within the most extreme bounds of generosity in all stores needed for the welfare of our sick and wounded in South Africa. It might interest the Committee to hear what are the appliances and the personnel in South Africa now, and what they were in January. I take those two dates for this reason. I think an idea has got abroad that, after that week in December which brought us the news of the three disasters, when we suddenly began to increase very largely the forces in South Africa, no corresponding increase was at once made in the provision of doctors, nurses, and hospital appliances. This is not so; and I can illustrate the great difference between the resources available then and now if I take the date of 15th January and the most recent date for which I have the figures—namely, 15th June. On 15th January there were in South Africa 351 Army medical doctors; on 15th June, 446. In January there were seventy-nine civil medical doctors; in June, 348; and thirty-two are now proceeding there. Of consultants, highly-paid specialists, there were three in January; in June, seven. The doctors employed in civilian hospitals in January were four; in June, fifty-two. Or adding them together, on 15th January there were 437 doctors employed by the War Office, and in June, 853. That was the number on 15th June, but I have the later figures up to yesterday, when, I think, the total was 906. I leave out of account the local civil practitioners in South Africa, because I have not had the figures; but there are many eminent doctors there well qualified, and I know that they have placed their services at the disposal of the Government. The figures which I will now give as to the Army nurses will, I know, excite surprise. It is true that our staff of Army nurses on the establishment is always a small one. In South Africa there were forty-three in January and fifty-three in June; but the system designedly contemplated that there should be employed in time of war qualified nurses, who are taken into Army employment; and thus there were in January twelve and in June 335; so that the total of nurses in January was fifty-five; on 15th June, 482. But the last date which I have gives 566, and with those who are now on passage 639. I will now give the number of beds in South Africa. There are 5,000 in Natal and 13,600 in Cape Colony, or 18,600 in all. Here again I am able to draw a comparison. On 15th January there were five general hospitals, four stationary hospitals, twenty-six field hospitals, and one special hospital organised by civilians. On 15th June there were twelve general hospitals; two are embarking—one of them goes to-morrow—five stationary, thirty-one field, and ten special hospitals organised by civilians, but with Army doctors at the head of them and under the control of the War Office; so that on 15th January there were thirty-six and in June sixty hospitals. On 15th January there were in these hospitals 5,960 beds; on 15th June 18,814 beds. The number of sick and wounded on 19th January was 3,731, and on 18th May, the last date for which I have the figures, there were 11,903. I know that down to the most recent period there is an excess of beds in South Africa, because we received a telegram on 19th June to say that the Ordnance Department in South Africa had beds in excess of the demand. The difficulty has not arisen from any stinting of supplies, but from the inseparable difficulties in taking those supplies to the base of operations. I do not wish to put the case too highly, or to use any expression which may give a more favourable picture of affairs than is absolutely true, and in the figures for beds I have included the field hospitals because I am not able to distinguish. In the field hospitals there are 100 beds which some people say are not beds. With every brigade there is a field hospital. This gives a 10 per cent. bed accommodation, and we ought, perhaps, to deduct a slight fraction and say that our provision has been not a 10 per cent. but an 8 per cent. of beds. What is the scale on which provision was made for this campaign? The scale was a 10 per cent. bed accommodation for the whole force—the highest scale ever contemplated. It is a scale fixed for campaigns in the most insalubrious climates, for campaigns prosecuted in Ashanti, in jungle or fever-riddled regions, but never applied in such a country as South Africa, which is, barring the terrible epidemics which have suddenly taken place, a healthy country. I ought, perhaps, to tell the Committee that that scale of 10 per cent. of beds has been applied seriatim to every increase made in our forces in South Africa. Each division ordered forth has been accompanied by its proportionate quota of medical appliances and medical staff. So, again, I remind the Committee that I do not say no mistakes have been made, or that five or six days delay here or there has not occurred owing to information that some Australian or Canadian corps was coming in. I have no doubt that there have been such lapses, and that five or six days have been lost in giving orders to keep pace with the increases of forces from all quarters of the world. The number of men who have gone from this country, from India, Australia, and Canada, within a few days, have made that proportionate increase in the personnel and in the stores necessary. I do not know whether the Committee wish to know what the organisation of the medical service is. I hear complaints that there is too much red tape. I am quite prepared to defend that organisation. With every general there is a principal medical officer. He is in the secrets of the general; he is in his confidence. He is told what number of troops are to be marched, what distance, in what time; and he requisitions through the chief staff officer for the amount of stores necessary for such an operation. That system runs from the top to the bottom of the organisation of a campaign. It may seem too rigid to those who step into a particular hospital and wonder why the doctor cannot rush off in any direction and seek by his own energy to get supplies. You would have a breakdown of the most irreparable character unless you co-ordinated the demand of your medical services with the other demands which are necessary for the existence of the Army. For the doctor, the engineer, the commander of the military unit, it is essential that they, having been told what is required of the force for which they are responsible, should through one channel make these demands, and that that channel should be in the closest contact with the general officer responsible for the whole operations. Otherwise you would have the various component parts of the Army naturally out of their zeal rushing against each other; and you might have medical stores and no food, or food and no medical stores, according to the opportunities which might fortuitously fall to one or other officer. Having dealt with organisation, perhaps I ought to refer to field hospitals and beds. There are in the front line of the army bearer companies with six ambulance wagons. Then comes the field hospital. Though the bearer company takes the man out of action, he may have to lie on the field until seven o'clock in the evening, since it may be impossible to approach him. The field hospital on a larger scale cannot give to the wounded man all that is given to him in hospital at home, or beds as in a general hospital. The wounded are collected from the field, and it is a necessary part of army organisation on service that field hospitals should be temporary in their character, since they have to move rapidly with the army and clear the wounded back to the stationary hospitals which are established near the base. That may be done by wagons or trains. In this war it has been done largely by hospital trains. There is terrible hardship, in the first place because the wounded cannot be at once removed out of the firing line and taken to the hospital; and in the second place they have to be conveyed over a rough country in an ambulance wagon and put into a train, and then conveyed by a train on a single line blocked sometimes with stores going the other way, taking twenty-six hours to cover a short distance; all this means terrible hardship to the wounded. I know there has been a good deal of criticism levelled against the ambulance wagon; but it is a wagon which is devised after four years of experiment by men who know what are the conditions of service in the field, notably by Sir Redvers Buller. The wagon has been tried over rough country. It must be a stout wagon, or else it will break down, and a breakdown means some deplorable catastrophe. Your wagon must carry some stores necessary for first aid to the wounded. If those stores were not there, what legitimate attacks might be levelled against a wagon which could not carry those stores which were necessary for first aid. Then it is said, "If one wagon why not four wagons? Expense is nothing to us." If you had four wagons, and a rapid advance was ordered, three would be left behind. When horses begin to die you can only take one wagon, and the others would be left. These things must be matter of compromise, and the compromises of war carry with them many lamentable hardships to those engaged in it. To make my point clear that there has been no stint of supplies from home, I have two telegrams here despatched very near the dates so prominently brought forward by the hon. Member for Westminster. One is a telegram despatched by Lord Roberts, dated Bloemfontein, 24th March, and it runs as follows—

> "Unless the forces now in South Africa are considerably increased, the eleven general hospitals should be sufficient if the 500 men asked for are being sent."

These 500 men were sent long ago, and although the forces in South Africa have not been considerably increased, two more general hospitals have been sent out. Then there is a telegram relating to stores received on 31st May from the General Officer commanding lines of communication. I quote it only because of the date, and I have selected only those telegrams which bear upon the hon. Member's questions. This telegram reads—

> "Please stop sending for the present surgical material mentioned in Army Order No. 112,119; enormous quantities in base medical stores."

[An HON. MEMBER: That is at the base.] That is my point, and I will try to bring home to hon. Members what the difficulties are. My point is to show that there has not been any lack of foresight or prevision. The keenest foresight and lavishness of expenditure are the two points I am endeavouring to deal with. I do respectfully submit to the Committee that such telegrams as I have read point to the conclusion that, whilst we have neither refused a demand nor reduced a demand, we have, on the contrary, made spontaneous offers of supplies, till at Cape Town stores have been piled up to an almost embarrassing degree. I come now to Bloemfontein and Kroonstad, which the hon. Member for Westminster has so prominently brought under notice. First I will quote two other telegrams, one of which has been sent and one received since those telegrams which have been printed and circulated among hon. Members. On 27th June my noble friend Lord Lansdowne telegraphed to Lord Roberts—

"The Times contains letter from Mr. Burdett-Coutts reflecting in strongest terms on hospital administration. He takes as an illustration a field hospital within a mile of Bloemfontein, which, he says, neither has nurses nor beds nor mattresses, although it was practically doing the work of a stationary hospital. He describes the overcrowding and suffering as deplorable. Your telegram explains the difficulties experienced at Bloemfontein, but I should like to know whether this hospital, which can probably be identified, is really typical of the rest."

Lord Roberts, in his reply on the 28th June, says—

"I cannot say without careful inquiry what hospital at Bloemfontein is referred to. In many cases patients were not fit to be moved after admission. It was, however, impossible to provide beds and mattresses for 5,000 patients all at once. I can safely say that any deficiencies of the kind were accidental and temporary, and certainly not typical of our field hospitals as a whole."

Then I go to the contemporary records, written at the time, of what there was at Bloemfontein at the date mentioned. On 27th April there were at Bloemfontein six fully-equipped general hospitals, with 2,000 beds in all and with considerable capacity for extension. There were altogether 2,291 patients in the military hospitals on that date at Bloemfontein, 873 being cases of enteric. There were six field hospitals, of which all but one had to be prepared for being moved at any time. One was regarded to be more or less stationary. On 27th April there were six medical officers and three nursing sisters on duty there, in addition to the Royal Army Medical Corps orderlies. There were 251 patients, of whom 96 were enteric cases. In the remaining five field hospitals there were 236 cases of enteric. The return from No. 1 field hospital indicates that it was overcrowded, but this may have occurred during a period of temporary pressure. The difficulties of moving up supplies extended even to stretchers, and it is true that in some cases patients may have had to lie on the ground, as it was impossible in every case to get a sufficient number of stretchers. Although the number of doctors present is not stated, I myself believe, and indeed am informed by the director-general, that the number of medical officers in attendance must have been twenty or thirty, which was one to every ten or fifteen enteric patients. With reference to the allegation that patients wandered about half naked in the camp during the period of delirium, I find in the diaries which were sent home a note that a patient suffering from an old gunshot wound escaped in the early hours, that an exhaustive search was made for the patient, but that no trace of him could be found, and that inquiries at the various hospitals failed to discover him. It may be that the impression created on the minds of the searchers was what the hon. Member for Westminster heard of, and led to the rumour that patients went about the camp in their delirium. On 14th May the principal medical officer reported in his diary that Lord Roberts had expressed the opinion that the arrangements at Bloemfontein were most satisfactory, and that is a later date than that to which the hon. Member for Westminster has called attention. Then we had the telegrams from Lord Roberts circulated yesterday, and I also invite the attention of the Committee to the lecture by the Member for Central Sheffield at the Royal United Service Institution, in which my hon. and gallant friend made some most useful and pertinent observations. [Laughter.] This is made the subject of laughter by hon. Gentlemen opposite, but surely such laughter will be misunderstood by the men out there who have to deal with these difficulties, and who have striven to labour and smooth over these difficulties. I am going to show what those difficulties were, and surely that is not a legitimate matter for laughter, derision, or contempt.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): We did not laugh at that; we laughed at the authority you quoted. [Cries of "Vincent."]

MR. WYNDHAM: I have admitted that the sick and wounded were exposed to great hardships at Bloemfontein, and I say that those charged with their care had to exercise and did exercise, and show the greatest devotion, labouring for their charges day and night. It will be a matter for universal consolation and satisfaction that their labours were, to a wonderful extent, successful; because it is not the case that the rate of mortality at Bloemfontein was abnormally high. That is wonderful testimony to the efforts which these people made under great difficulties. The percentage of mortality in enteric cases during this war, and more especially at Bloemfontein, has been 21 per cent. of the admissions to hospital. It is fair to compare that with the percentage in other campaigns. In the Nile campaign of 1898 the percentage of mortality was 28 per cent.; in the Dongola campaign of 1896, 50 per cent.; in the Matabele war of 1896-97, 32 per cent.; in the Chitral campaign of 1895, 28 per cent.; and in the Soudan campaign of 1884-85, 39 per cent. Therefore, although I own and admit and regret that the conditions at Bloemfontein were what they were, still our Army doctors brought down the percentage of mortality far below what it has been in recent campaigns. I will even dare to compare it with the percentages in time of peace when every appliance is at hand. I will take the case of soldiers in our own hospitals at home. During ten years the percentage of cases of mortality from enteric in these hospitals was 20·4, and in the year 1897 it was 23·9, or 2 per cent. higher than the percentage of mortality at Bloemfontein under these conditions. In India, taking soldiers admitted to hospital for enteric in a time of profound peace, the percentage of deaths for ten years was 26·4, and for the year 1897, 27·5. I will not pursue similar comparisons for wounds, because I may tell the Committee that the percentage of deaths from wounds and from disease generally in the present war have been lower than has been the case in other campaigns. I think the Committee have listened to these statistics with the interest and satisfaction which I admit they aroused in me when I read them, for I had feared that many lives which could have been saved had been lost, and I am now almost led to believe that this is not the case. I do not quarrel with the method which has been pursued of painting a picture of this one spot at its worst, but there ought to have been a companion picture to make it fair and give the whole truth—of where the bridges had been broken down at Norvals Pont and Bethulie, of the trains one behind the other, of the stores piled up, of the deviations laid down and the food and ammunition for the Army being painfully taken over pontoons and reloaded into such rolling stock as had been left on the other side of the river by the Boers when they retired. That was the problem that had to be faced. Lord Roberts landed at Cape Town on the 10th January. By the 11th February he had collected 44,000 men near the Modder River and started to relieve Kimberley. He relieved it on the 16th, and then he concentrated his force again at Paardeberg, and on the 13th of March he entered Bloemfontein, after marching 120 miles away from the railway. Lord Roberts, owing to the limited amount of transport, had to restrict his baggage to the lowest scale, and he arrived with his horses wholly starved and his men half starved. What was the problem before him? He had to supply his army with its daily bread and with the munitions of war. He had to collect more troops and to accumulate stores for a further advance. Now will it be said that therefore his march was a mistake? No one will say that. It was not a showy march to capture the capital of the enemy's country. That huge curve which Lord Roberts described was really a march of relief of the beleaguered garrisons of Ladysmith, Kimberley, and Mafeking, and that is the excuse and the ample justification for that daring move for which it is hard to find a parallel in military history. Bloemfontein is a town of 5,000 inhabitants, and all the stores and cattle in it had been removed, and therefore for the very existence of his army Lord Roberts had to depend upon such food and so many cartridges as could be brought up by the line behind him. He had to draw up stores from De Aar, 250 miles distant, and from places on the coast 750, 450, and 350 miles away. For the last 85 miles from Springfontein there was only a single line. Lord Roberts had not restored his railway communications.

until 19th March. I do not know when the bridges were restored, but on 16th March Colonel Girouard estimated that it would take at least sixteen days to restore them. What was the problem of feeding the army? Lord Roberts had 45,000 men when he arrived at Bloemfontein, and he increased that number to 75,000 by 30th April. It takes ten tons for every 1,000 men every day during a campaign. That gives about 22lb. a day to each man, including food, ammunition, clothes, forage, medical stores, and engineer stores, but not including the carriage of the men who come up or their horses. Take an average of the 45,000 men at Bloemfontein on 13th March and the 75,000 men there when Lord Roberts moved, and you will find that he had to bring up to keep his army alive 550 tons a day. But then he had to collect his supplies for a further advance, because if he had not advanced Mafeking would have fallen, and the whole of that glorious move would have ended in a mere useless waste of men's lives. To prepare for a further advance he had to collect twenty-five days provisions for the whole 75,000 men to take on with them. This represented a further 18,750 tons that had to be brought up, or 470 tons a day for the forty days he was at Bloemfontein, so that this single line, the bridges of which were down, up to the last day of March was carrying 1,020 tons a day in order that Lord Roberts's army should not starve or be defeated owing to want of ammunition. I have left out of account the 6,000 horses as remounts and the mules and the tents that had to be brought up. I have a letter supplied to me by my friend the hon. Member for Wimbledon, who is a governor of Guy's Hospital. It was sent to him by Dr. Fripp, who is not in our employ, and it gives such a graphic description of the difficulties of getting up stores that I will trouble the Committee with passages from it. It is dated from Bloemfontein, 4th June. Dr. Fripp says that in Bloemfontein there were at that time over 5,000 sick, most of whom were suffering from enteric fever; while in Kroonstad the three hotels, the town hall, and the church had been converted into hospitals, even the billiard tables being requisitioned to accommodate cases of enteric fever. He adds that as the railway had been opened the Surgeon General was engaged in rapidly pushing up adequate hospital accommodation, and that as Lord Roberts was now at Johannesburg, where there were public buildings suitable for the purpose, hospitals would be established there.

"We have now heard," the letter states, "of the bridge over the Vaal being blown up"— and hon. Members will see how this bears on the point—

"and the possibility of establishing adequate hospital accommodation across the Vaal depends entirely on the question how early the railway can be established. At each river the bridges have been blown up, deviations have to be made, the engines are worn out—they cannot pull their loads across these steep gradients without a subdivision of the train. Each train delayed in this way affects the whole section of the line. The track is a single one, and therefore trains going both ways are delayed. The train we have travelled up from Bloemfontein to Kroonstad, although first on the line, took twenty-six hours to do the 120 miles. There is also a scarcity of fuel and water, which renders it necessary for the engine-driver sometimes to abandon his train and run the engine on to fill its tanks and then back to pick up the train."

If hon. Members will realise these facts, if they will realise what it means to take 1,020 tons a day in order to keep the army alive by such a machine of locomotion, I think they will understand that it was possible, that it was inevitable, that the necessary stores should not be in Bloemfontein for days and even weeks after they were required. The picture drawn by the hon. Member for Westminster rests upon this fallacy—it assumes that Bloemfontein was a base hospital in perfect security. It was as I have described; the means of access to it were as I have described; and during the whole of that time when Lord Roberts was accomplishing this superhuman task. Far from being free from attack, his right flank and his line of communication were being threatened and actions were being fought every day. What I have said is an inference from the conditions of warfare in South Africa, an inference from the facts before us—a legitimate inference—which I think should be accepted by all. But I do not rest on inference alone. The inference I have drawn is confirmed by contemporary evidence. If the Committee will bear with me a moment longer I should like to read some extracts from the diary of the principal medical officer at the base at Cape Town, showing these daily difficulties.

"5th February.—Our railways are being blocked, and I cannot get up beds and bedding as quickly as I desire.

"22nd February.—I have received a telegram from Lord Roberts that more medical officers are urgently required.

"15th March. — Received wire from the Commander-in-Chief at Bloemfontein to be ready to send on thirty nurses as soon as the line is open.

"21st March.—No. 8 general hospital has arrived. As the main line is blocked it must be days before it can be pushed through.

"5th April.—Nos. 8, 9, and 10 general hospitals have arrived. All are under orders for Bloemfontein. No. 8 is now at East London, and as part only of the equipment can be forwarded, I cannot say when 9 and 10 will get through. Hospitals are urgently required in the Free State. I was fortunate to get the advance depôt stores away.

"10th April.—Two hospital trains arrived yesterday from Bloemfontein. I hope to get them away this evening, as they are urgently required. I am sending one hundred beds. There are three general hospitals trying to get to Bloemfontein. The traffic is so great that I am unable to get them through."

Does not that account for the terrible, the deplorable state of affairs that the hon. Member for Westminster found at Bloemfontein? I have tried to give the Committee the facts—the full facts. I am sure the Committee, in taking them into account, will weigh the considerations that have been urged by Lord Roberts—a general who is making history by these difficult marches, and while doing that is winning an enduring place in the affections of the men who serve under him for his incessant solicitude for their welfare. But is there not also the testimony of the wounded who have come home? Is there not the almost unbroken silence of the press? [HON. MEMBERS on the Irish benches: No, no!] I am not talking of the leading article; I am talking of the press gentlemen who are out in South Africa, and who have eyes to see; and are we to believe that if they saw these things they would not have written home about them? [HON. MEMBERS on the Irish benches: They have done so. What about the Censor?] Letters are not censored. [HON. MEMBERS on the Irish benches: They are.] I beg that I may not be interrupted. What I say is that what was open to the hon. Member for Westminster was well within the competence of others to see at Bloemfontein. No one will suggest that these gentlemen were parties to a conspiracy—some conspiracy of mistaken good nature or loyalty to those with whom they were associated in danger and in hard days. If they saw those scenes, they believed they were inevitable in war, and therefore they did not feel justified in harrowing the feelings of people at home by descriptions of them. They had seen war before, and having had the experience of war they grasped the conditions of war and all that it means. We are a rich people, and being rich we sometimes think that money can do everything. Money has been spent freely, money voted by the House with the full sanction of the people; but even the money voted so unstintedly by the House, even the intelligence and zeal of the medical officers in South Africa, even the devotion they have displayed, though they have mitigated, could not abolish the horrors of war. What is it that we honour and respect in the soldier? It is not wholly or mainly because he gives his life in battle for the cause of his country; but because he bears with uncomplaining heroism the hardships that are inherent in his lot in war.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): I feel that I must in one respect ask the indulgence of the Committee. I was perfectly well aware that I returned single-handed to face a tremendous combination of influences and impressions. I am aware that I have taken upon myself a great and grave responsibility. But it is not on that account that I ask the indulgence of the Committee. I am not afraid of the responsibility. What I ask is that, in stating a case so important from a national and every other point of view, any personal shortcomings of mine should not be allowed to interfere with the Committee in judging the question upon its merits. I am bound to make one or two preliminary remarks. In the first place, with regard to Lord Roberts, I desire to take this the only opportunity I have had after having seen Lord Roberts's work to pay my tribute to the great services rendered to his country by that distinguished soldier, and to say I believe that no kinder or more humane heart breathes than his, who braced himself to a great public duty under very painful circumstances. But I must refer to Lord Roberts in regard to another matter. I observe that in his published correspondence Lord Roberts makes a personal reference to myself. I must therefore ask to be allowed to make a personal explanation in regard to that. Lord Roberts states that if I had called upon him at Kroonstad he would have explained certain matters to me. Immediately after my arrival at Cape Town I wrote to Lord Roberts a somewhat long letter fully explaining the objects of my visit to South Africa and asking permission to join the troops at the front. I received no reply to that letter; but I am bound to say that at the time Lord Roberts received it he was fully occupied with other and more important matters. The day after my arrival at Bloemfontein I called upon Lord Roberts, but was unable to see him. I did see a member of his staff, and that gentleman argued very strongly against my being with the troops at all, stating, amongst other things, that if Lord Roberts desired to make a report to the public upon this matter he would make it, founded upon reports sent to him from his principal medical officers. I could not avoid replying that that theory would do away with all correspondents at the front, adding that this was a matter in which the public were deeply interested and with regard to which they might possibly be glad to have some independent and full information. However, I quite accepted the position, and was not altogether sorry, because it left me free to make my inquiries in a perfectly independent manner. With regard to Lord Roberts I wish to say one thing more. However generously he may take upon himself the responsibility for all these things, I do not believe that anyone will allow it to rest upon his shoulders. When we consider that the Commander-in-Chief of an army of 200,000 men, operating in different columns in divers parts of the country, has to hold in his head and his hands all the complicated plans and threads of these operations, it is absolutely impossible to expect him to supervise, or even to inform himself as to details of a medical system. There is another remark I ask leave to make, because I see that one of my public critics—one of those two gentlemen I have felt compelled to criticise very strongly—began an answer to my statements by saying that he thought the public ought to know that the doctors and nurses had not acted with brutality. Has there ever been a suggestion of that kind in any letter or published utterance of mine? On the contrary, I have given every possible credit to the loyalty and devotion with which those who have had the care of the patients have acted, and I take this opportunity of expressing my deep regret that many—far too many of them—have lost their lives in the performance of their noble task. Unfortunately, in the course of my informing the public upon this subject, the last chapter, so to speak, was not completed. The article upon which this debate is founded broke off at a field hospital at Bloemfontein, and it has not been possible for me to put forward the rest of my account of Bloemfontein, which was to have started with a description of the town hospitals. There were eight hospitals in that town, and they accommodated at first about 700 patients. Some of these hospitals were then in a fairly good condition; there were three which had nurses resident in them at the time the troops arrived, who confined their duties to these hospitals. I heard a great many complaints of the imperfections of the other town hospitals, and a great many accounts of the sufferings of the patients in the early days. I never had the slightest intention of giving any publicity to those accounts, simply because I knew that the equipment of those hospitals was the outcome of a forced march, and because, until the railway was opened I did not think it fair to criticise them. The hon. Member who has just sat down made a great point of the forced march and the difficulty of carrying equipments for hospitals, but I might state here that, after the railway was opened, there was one of the hospitals containing typhoid patients which had no disinfectants of any kind, and another in which the corpse of one of the patients who had died during the night had been stuffed into the only lavatory there was in the hospital. It was found by the patients who went to use the lavatory in the morning. That is a question of management. But as to these hospitals, they were, on the whole, in a fair condition when I arrived at Bloemfontein. Most of the sick or wounded officers went into them; but some officers went into the private hospitals, which were moved up to Bloemfontein after the first month. A few officers went into the general hospitals. The private hospitals, as the right hon. Gentleman has said, all did admirable work, but I may say they were considerably hampered by the absence or deficiency of nurses; a deficiency solely due to the objection of the Department at home to allow them to take out sufficient nurses in the first instance. They had all been anxious to have a proper quota of nurses, but their request had been refused by the Army Medical Department here. Now, may I venture to say a word with regard to myself? I went out to South Africa because I believed that this was a question which greatly interested hundreds of thousands of people, and I was determined that if the treatment of the sick and wounded was satisfactory the public should know it, and that if it was not satisfactory they should also know it. I want to ask two questions in my own defence. In the first place, am I a sentimental witness? My experience of war was gained in the Russo-Turkish war. That was a barbarous war—a war in which there was practically no medical service on the Turkish side. I only recall this to show that I am the last person to be exigeant with regard to the treatment of the sick and wounded in war. Then, am I a prejudiced or an unfair witness? I appeal to the series of articles I have published and which described the base hospitals at Cape Town. Those hospitals were in an admirable condition when I arrived at Cape Town, and I appeal to everyone whether I have not given every possible credit to, and the most favourable picture I could possibly portray of, those hospitals. There is an article of mine published this morning which gives a long account of one of them. The detail into which I have entered proves, I think, that I have been careful in my examination of the hospitals, and the favourable view I have expressed proves the fairness with which I have acted. Now I come back to Bloemfontein. There is one word in my published letter which I regret, and only one; and that is where I speak of the field hospital I have described as an "illustration," without having guarded that phrase by saying it was the worst field hospital there. It was undoubtedly much the worst, but the other field hospitals had no attempt at beds, not sufficient stretchers, insufficient staffs, and were altogether, if they were to be occupied for any length of time, unfit, to my mind, for that purpose. Now I want to explain to the Committee a point which I think has been missed in treating of these field hospitals. The Under Secretary gave a description of the use to which a field hospital is put when it accompanies troops, and how impossible it is to equip it with the equipment of a stationary hospital. I quite admit that that is the case when the hospital accompanies troops, but the Committee must remember that this hospital was not accompanying the troops. It was stationary outside Bloemfontein, within less than a mile of the town, and it has frequently happened in this campaign that where a field hospital was to be used as a stationary hospital it was treated and equipped as such. The chief authority on this subject, Colonel Stephenson, states most emphatically that "where a field hospital is going to be occupied for any considerable time, every effort should be made to raise the patients from the ground." With regard to this particular hospital, there is no need to labour the point, because on the occasion of my first visit to the hospital the officer in command of it told me it was going to be a stationary hospital. With regard to that hospital, and as regards the question of overcrowding, I think my description has been read by most members of the Committee, of the state of things which I witnessed there. Well, I declare that every word of that description is absolutely true, and a picture of what I saw with my own eyes. But I cannot examine the reasonableness of the impression produced upon my eyes except by an appeal to figures. As I stated, there were ten men crowded into a bell tent. The measurement of a bell tent is known; I cannot give it to you exactly. But I see it is stated in a letter in to-day's Times that bell tents hold sixteen people. All I can say is that they do not hold sixteen patients. Possibly sixteen people might be crowded into them, but how I cannot imagine. Ten patients, at any rate, are so crowded that when you want to speak to a sick person—a man whose voice is so weak that it cannot reach you standing—and you kneel down and put your face close to his, you have to kneel on one knee and put the other foot behind, because there is not room to put both knees side by side. I am told by one of my critics that it is not true that patients lay upon the hard ground. All I have to say is this — that there were 316 patients in the field hospital, and I saw the greater number of them lying on the ground on a single blanket each and a thin waterproof sheet. I doubt if all the patients had waterproof sheets. I adduce in support of this statement the fact that that field hospital had half the equipment of an ordinary field hospital. It had been divided into two on the march. An ordinary field hospital has 100 stretchers, and, therefore, this should have had fifty; but eight of these had disappeared, and there remained forty-two stretchers in the hospital. There were 316 patients, and therefore, as I stated, there were 274 patients who had to lie on the ground. I have further to state that these figures and all the figures which appeared in my article on this subject were given to me by the medical officer commanding and in charge of the hospital. I observe that in the cabled messages, of which we have heard quotations just now, Lord Roberts states as the reason for not vacating these hospitals that the patients were not fit to be moved. I have given an instance where, unfortunately, at the close of the career of the hospital, twenty patients who ought never to have been moved were moved—three or four of them in a most critical stage of a dangerous disease. Anyone who knows about typhoid knows the local conditions of it. They were put into ox wagons There were no ambulances. This was two months after our entrance into Bloemfontein. The men were put into these wagons and jolted over the veldt, over the roughest possible ground, and one man was in that stage where his case was hopeless. They were taken to another and more permanent hospital. I have stated in the press that four of these men died in a few days. There is another remark I might make under the head of the field hospitals, and that is with regard to the insufficiency of the personnel. Such was the insufficiency of orderlies that patients could not be prevented when in a delirious state from getting up and wandering into the cold air at night. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for War has referred to a case, and for some reason or other—I did not quite catch the argument—inferred that it was a solitary case. Why, it happened not only in this hospital but in many other hospitals night after night, solely on account of the insufficiency of the personnel and the insufficiency of men to take care of the patients. I could give the hon. Gentleman other instances, but I will not detain the House. I can only take the hon. Gentleman's arguments and reply to them by facts, which I must state in the interest of bringing out the truth in this matter. I greatly regret if I have erred in decorum, or in the judgment of the House, in not rising first to speak. I considered the subject, and it appeared to me that I had laid a charge, and I thought that I might reasonably expect to hear what explanation the Government had to give. I desired to give them an opportunity of making a statement of their case. Of course, it is perfectly competent for the hon. Gentleman to reply to me, as we are in Committee. The first thing that struck me when I saw the crowded state of these field hospitals surrounding Bloemfontein was why more houses and more buildings were not taken to supply hospital accommodation. As I have shown, there were seven or eight buildings taken, which contained an aggregate of 700 patients at a time when there were 2,200 patients in and around Bloemfontein. There were three considerable hotels in the place, there was the town hall, there were large stores, all of which might have been turned into hospitals. In addition to these there were a considerable number of most comfortable private houses which were not occupied by their owners. Their owners had left the town. The houses had grounds around them, in which tents for the attendants might have been placed. Why were they not taken for hospitals? Houses were taken, and legitimately taken—I am not making any complaint—for staff officers and military authorities. [Opposition cheers and Ministerial cries of "Oh, oh!"] I do not make that remark—[Opposition cheers and renewed cries of "Oh!" and an hon. Member: "Shame!"] Well then, I repeat—and I say it without any arrière pensée—that such houses were taken as residences for military officers, and I could not see any reason why many more of them should not have been taken for the men who were allowed to remain ill in the tents. I am not saying that the staff and the military officers and authorities should have given up houses that they were in;

I am only arguing that there were other houses there that could be taken for hospitals. The real reason was that there was no one and nothing to put into them in the way of medical personnel or medical equipment. With regard to personnel, I do not claim that the personnel suitable to these hospitals should have come with Lord Roberts on the forced march to Bloemfontein. But a comparatively few days after, the road to Bloemfontein—for the deviation at Norval's Pont was open—was clear, and troops were constantly coming up in numbers, even supplies were coming up. It would have been perfectly possible to have sent up doctors and orderlies. I also say it would have been possible to have sent up nurses, because the road was safe and Bloemfontein was safe at that time. With regard to nursing, I considered myself, like a great many others, that the evils which occured at Bloemfontein were owing to the absence of a proper female nursing staff. They might have gone there if they were in the country in sufficient numbers. They might have been there by 1st April, and they might have been there in greater numbers by 15th April, and hundreds of them might have been there at the end of April, the date at which I saw what I have described. There was no possible reason patent to the eye there why they should not. The nurses of the three extemporised hospitals were there. The women of the town population were there, going about their normal occupations. But the women nurses of England were not there to attend to those soldiers, and if they had been I believe a great many lives might have been saved. I now come to the question of the equipment of these hospitals, which involves the question of transport. The hon. Gentleman has given a very graphic and, in some respects, a powerful account of the difficulties of transport to Bloemfontein. I had myself made some very careful calculations on this subject, but I will not trouble the Committee with them, because I think the hon. Gentleman has eased my way. The Under Secretary said that 1,000 tons of material came up to Bloemfontein every day for forty days. I ask, supposing one train a day—I believe there were twelve luggage trains per day—had contained some hospital equipment, what an enormous boon it would have been to those poor people who were there? As far as I can make out there was no provision for hospital equipment coming up to Bloemfontein at that time. I have stated very clearly what my own position is, and what I feel, with regard to the relation between military exigencies and humanity—that, where military exigencies are entirely incompatible with the proper treatment of the sick and wounded, military exigencies must come first, but that where considerations of humanity can be carried out by a reasonable inroad upon military exigencies—that is to say, by something that will not endanger your military success—humanity ought to be considered. I want the Committee to consider for a moment what the position was in Bloemfontein. The greatest pressure of sickness came, I think, in about the second week of May; I was with the troops on the march at the time. For six weeks previous to that time the railway had been running freely, and all these luggage trains and troops had been moving up. Many of us, and, I fancy, many other people in the world, were very much astonished at the long delay at Bloemfontein. I do not say it was unnecessary; it is not for me to express an opinion upon that. All I say is that there was no apparent necessity, and I cannot conceive anybody showing a positive reason, why the general advance from Bloemfontein seven weeks after the troops arrived there should have taken place on the 1st rather than on the 2nd or 3rd of May. My point is that one day's strains on that railroad would have saved the whole position as regards the sick and wounded, and unless it can be shown that there was an imperative necessity for the general advance taking place on that particular day, I think the facts show that the necessities of the sick and wounded were postponed for considerations which were not in any way vital or important from a strategic point of view. I have spoken of what seems to me to have been a very unnecessary delay in sending up the equipment. I am bound to weary the Committee somewhat, because I am dealing with the facts of the case, which are rather full. No. 9 general hospital arrived in Bloemfontein on the 8th April, and the tents were erected. They stood there perfectly empty until the 22nd April, because there was no personnel and no equipment of any kind to put into them. The heaviest parts of the hospital had been brought up; the lightest part was kept back or not brought up for a whole fortnight, although every day the working of the railway was becoming easier. I cannot conceive any reason, except disorganisation, which separated that hospital, which might have contained 520 patients, from its equipment, which was necessary before the patients could go into it. I should be the last to minimise the difficulties of transport to Bloemfontein, and it has been suggested that there were broken bridges and all that sort of thing; but the time with which I have dealt covers a period from the 1st April to the end of May, during the whole of which the railway was open, at first by a deviation, and afterwards over the bridge. From the great number of trains which came up every day to Bloemfontein, and the character of the material which they carried, I myself was more and more astonished that the equipment of these hospitals was not brought up. Now I come to another question. I have spoken of the two general hospitals, one of which came up on the 22nd April, and the other somewhat later. Those general hospitals were capable of holding, in the first instance, 520 patients. I think the limit of 520 which has been applied by the Army Medical Department to a general hospital is a very wise one; I do not think it is advisable to crowd more than that number together in one locality and with one set of tents. But these two general hospitals were stretched to the extent, in one case of 1,500, and in the other, 1,700 patients. No. 8 with 1,500 patients was placed in a good position about a mile from the town, and I cannot speak of it from personal observation, because before I left Bloemfontein it was hardly ready, and I had not time to see it on my way down from the front as I passed through Bloemfontein. But No. 9 general hospital, by containing 1,700 patients, to my mind was a tented city of pestilence. There was no attempt at classification. You had men carried or staggering in, one under a disease called "N.Y.D." and another under a disease called "S C.F." "N.Y.D." means "not yet diagnosed"; and "S.C.F." means "simple continuous fever." These patients were placed one on either side of a typhoid patient. I ask what hope or chance had these two men of escaping the deadly disease of the man between them? In many of the hospitals there was this absence of classification. I do not say that in all cases it was possible, but at least in a hospital where the patients could be placed in separate tents, it was possible, and this want of classification was one of the greatest evidences of the want of management that I saw under the Army medical system there. This hospital had no kitchen; the food had to be cooked outside in pits. It was what is called a non-dieted hospital, which means that it had no special arrangements for making those delicate diets which are necessary to fever patients. At the end of two months after we got to Bloemfontein it had only twenty nurses for 1,700 patients. Of course, it is open to anyone to object to female nurses in military hospitals altogether—that is a perfectly legitimate position to take up; but if you have female nurses at all I am justified in complaining of the number of nurses there were in this and many other hospitals. It is a number founded on the old Army medical theory that a nurse is not to nurse, but is simply to superintend the men in nursing. I do not know exactly the number of orderlies there were in the hospital, but the great proportion of them were entirely untrained private soldiers taken from infantry regiments. I want the Committee to consider for a moment what this means. I do not know that I can put it better than by suggesting that if any hon. Member here had a typhoid patient in his house it would be an absurd thing for him to go into the street and call in a navvy and say to him, "Nurse me that typhoid patient." I do not say that a private soldier who is used as a hospital orderly does not do his best. Of course he does his best. But he has absolutely no knowledge and absolutely no training, and no one will suggest that he has the natural tenderness of touch which would make him any more suited to be a nurse than any other man from the working classes. And a great many of these orderlies—these untrained private soldiers—were convalescents. I protest against the use of convalescent soldiers as orderlies in a fever hospital. What does it mean? It means that a man who has only just got up from a serious illness, who is still ill and weak and unable to concentrate his attention, who wants rest, fresh air, and quiet, is sent back into these fever-stricken tents to breathe the same bad air and to see these horrible sights, when he is too weak to perform the proper duties of a nurse, and when his faculties of watchfulness and attention are so enfeebled that he goes about his work drowsily, and is really incapable of discharging the duty. All over the hospitals at the front convalescent private soldiers were employed as nursing orderlies, and it seems to me it was a most inhuman practice. If there had been a sufficient number of properly-trained attendants, it would have been absolutely unnecessary. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for War said something about my not bringing forward any new matter. I have a great deal more new matter which I think the Committee ought to hear, but I wish to submit myself entirely to the judgment of the Committee. I will be as brief as possible. ["Go on."] I started with the troops from Bloemfontein, but unfortunately, or perhaps fortunately, I did not succeed in seeing any real action. I wanted to see the treatment of the wounded on the field, in order to complete my inspection. I did my best, but with a front extending so many miles, and the enemy not holding any position very strongly, I found it very difficult to find any real action going on. But as far as I could see the ambulances and doctors with the troops while on the march were fairly sufficient. I do not say they were absolutely sufficient, but they were fairly so. However, I do not feel really qualified to express an opinion about that. But I feel bound to state that on one occasion the following incident came to my notice. I heard some firing a few miles off on the left, and some other firing on the right. I went in the latter direction; but on the left there had been a very serious mishap to our troops—the disaster to the mixed squadron composed of Inniskillings and Scots Greys, who were cut up by an abuse of the white flag at a Kaffir kraal. They were only four miles from their brigade. It was known, of course, by their brigade that they were to occupy this position. The action took place at nine o'clock in the morning, and the Boers retired shortly afterwards. But no one came near these wounded soldiers until half-past four in the afternoon. The firing could be heard, and I could not understand why, if the brigade was properly supplied with ambulances and doctors, these wounded soldiers should not have been attended to. As a matter of fact, about half-past four the bearer company of the New South Wales medical contingent came up. I may tell the Committee this contingent is one of the finest specimens of medical service seen in the war. It consists of a bearer company and field hospital, perfectly disciplined and wonderfully efficient. Great use has been made of it wherever it has been, and its units have been broken up and taken in different directions. It is entirely composed of civilians, and the most eminent doctors in Australia are serving freely upon it. The particular officer in command of this bearer company which came to the rescue of these men was a certain Major Eames, who was always, if his own brigade was not fighting, cruising about with his bearer company to assist anybody in distress, and, fortunately, he found these men. He took them to a tin house on the railway, and formed a temporary hospital there. He supplied all the necessaries he could, and then left the men in charge of a medical officer and rejoined his own brigade. I came across these wounded later on. Many of the men were in a very dangerous condition; four of them died that night. Two days afterwards the doctor who was left in charge of these men received an order to evacuate this hospital and send the wounded away, and ox-wagons were sent for the purpose. He was a civilian doctor, and he protested, but his orders were very express. He did, however, insist on keeping three officers there. It seemed to me to be a strange thing that the men who were dangerously wounded —for he did not disguise the fact that the lives of these men were endangered by their being moved — should be taken away from that hospital while officers should be left in it. Of course, I can understand circumstances under which it would be necessary to evacuate a hospital of that sort, but if the doctor was compelled to send the men away while he was allowed to keep the officers, there seems to me to have been some unfair distinction. I now come to Kroonstad. We arrived at Kroonstad on a Saturday. On the Thursday after, an endeavour was made to equip two buildings—a church and a hotel — as hospitals; but there was absolutely nothing to put into them. There were 300 patients, but there were only two doctors; there were no nurses and no trained orderlies. There were four untrained orderlies in the church with 115 patients, and there were four more in the hotel with about 160 patients. I remind the Committee that I went up with the troops; dozens of other correspondents went up with the troops; innumerable attendants and nondescript people of different positions in addition to the Regular army went up with the troops; why, then, could not doctors and orderlies have gone up with the troops? If, as it has been maintained by the Under Secretary of State for War, there had been a sufficient personnel in South Africa, there was no possible reason why that personnel, putting aside the nurses if you like, should not have been at Kroonstad on the day we arrived there, ready to take their place in these hospitals. Then we come to the question of equipment—that is to say, beds, and so on. I will not detain the Committee by stating certain facts concerning the beds. There are very light collapsible beds, which can be used in emergencies, hundreds of which can be packed into one wagon. I would suggest that in this matter there has been a great want of prevision and a great amount of obstinacy on the part of the Army Medical Department. They use a tent which is called a marquee, but it was perfectly well known to them from the first that there is another hospital tent, called the "Tortoise" tent, which weighs half as much as a marquee, and yet holds two more patients. The Department knew that transport was going to be the great difficulty—that is the argument of the Under Secretary of State; they also knew that the tents formed more than half the weight of the hospital; and yet they did not take the trouble to provide themselves with the class of tent which would lessen the weight by one-half. I want to make my point quite clear about these hospitals at Kroonstad. We were followed by the army supplies, the transport service, and so on. There was a long train of bullock-wagons, each wagon capable of carrying between 6,000 and 7,000 pounds nett.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Not with a convoy.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: My information comes from the head of the Army Service Corps, but it doesn't make much difference to the argument.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Never mind.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I cannot say how many bullock-wagons there were, but I made a calculation that if the army started with rations and forage for five days supply—and I believe that was considered to be the minimum with which they ought to start—there would be something like 360 bullock-wagons in the Army train. Will anybody tell me that a train which contained 360 bullock-wagons could not have contained four or six more for hospital equipment? The proposition is absurd. There is no fixed limit at 360. If the Department had had the prevision to prepare these hospitals for Kroonstad it would have been perfectly easy to obtain the equipment and personnel. The great vice, the great fault and error at the front, has been the absence of a proper system of stationary hospitals—that is to say, hospitals which may possibly want tents, but which can generally be put into buildings on the line of march. An army advancing under ordinary circumstances does not leave its communications in danger; therefore the line between the army and its base is a continuous line of stations which are fairly safe, strategically speaking, and in these stations what are called stationary hospitals naturally find their place. On the question of preparation, I want to ask why, in all that idle time after the black week in the middle of December, if this equipment was there, was it not pushed up that 500 or 600 miles to De Aar, the rail-head? If it had been there when the communication was established with Bloemfontein the greater part of the distance would have been traversed, and it would have been perfectly possible and easy to have got that equipment further on. But during that period, as far as I know, nothing was done in the way of moving up any equipment to the front. It is not as if there was any uncertainty about our progress. The way was marked out clearly before us; we knew we were going to pursue it to the end; and certainly the equipment might have been got up to the rail-head, as it then was, in order that when the road was open, the road being practically a railroad, these stationary hospitals could have been established. I saw all through the ultimate result of this neglect of prevision. But I have not done with Kroonstad. There I saw the patients brought in from the field hospitals. They were carried by untrained hands. They were put down on the floor with no one to attend to them, although many of them were in dangerous stages of illness. The doctors themselves complained bitterly of the want of assistance. In consequence of the absence of stationary hospitals there, or of any proper hospital accommodation, convoys of sick and wounded moved off in ox-wagons—not ambulances, but ox-wagons, the bottoms of which are shaped like a V, so that the men cannot lie flat. I saw convoys of 150 sick men in various stages of illness, and many wounded men, put into these ox-wagons and sent a journey three days and nights over the veldt, with its burning heat at midday and its freezing cold at night, without any extra clothing, without any pretence of medical comforts, without any medical man, without any trained orderlies to accompany them. I saw one of these convoys stop at a station on the railway, and the man in charge of the convoy came to a doctor who was there and said, "I have got a man here who is dying; I have got no medicine, and I do not know what to do with him." The doctor, who knew something of the regulations, and that even under the Army Medical Department it was not only illegal, but a crime to send a convoy of sick and wounded away without a doctor, asked the man, "Are you in charge of these patients?" The man said, "No, I am not in charge of the patients; I am in charge of the list." That was the only attendant sent with this convoy for three days and nights over the veldt, and there was another convoy of 150 sick and wounded who were treated in exactly the same way. ["Shame!"] I do not want to pile on these accounts, but at the same place there was a man came into the house whose history I will tell the Committee. He had had enteric fever; he had been on milk diet for three weeks; he was sent immediately from that to rejoin his regiment. He was sent with a detail, of course by road, and he stopped at this particular place I am describing. As soon as he got on his horse the first day he tumbled off; he tumbled off his horse five times; the next day he kept tumbling off, but the men helped him on again, and he tumbled into this tin house a dead man. He had been sent on this journey to rejoin his regiment after he had been on a milk diet for three weeks, without the slightest rest or period of convalescence. These are incidents which I could go on multiplying, but it is not by my own wish I have already taken up so much time. I will come back to Bloemfontein once more for a moment. This was on the 23rd May. The troops, you will understand, were at Kroonstad. Bloemfontein was perfectly well equipped by that time, except that it was the scene of the pressure of enteric which I have described. On the 23rd May I was informed there were eight wounded men lying on the platform at Bloemfontein station. I went down and saw those men lying on the platform. They had arrived at Bloemfontein after a fifteen hours journey in open trucks, at six o'clock in the morning; they were out on the platform, and there they lay until half-past three in the afternoon with absolutely nobody to attend to them. ["Oh, oh!"] Bloemfontein was as safe and comfortable then as Bloomsbury. The Railway Staff Officer telegraphed at eleven o'clock to the Principal Medical Officer in the town saying these men were there; but no one, doctor or orderly, came near them the whole of that time. Early in the morning there happened to be a hospital train in the goods station close by; some of the sisters heard of these wounded men and went to them, and gave them two tins of condensed milk and a tin of beef-tea, and these were shared by the eight sick men and several others. The station was in full swing; porters, passengers, and so on were walking about, but these men were left unnoticed. Four of them were dying. I knelt down and put my face close to theirs, but could hardly hear their whispers; I tried to get names and regimental numbers. I say that to allow those men to lay there from six o'clock in the morning until half-past three in the afternoon was a disgrace. At last, the ambulance of the Irish Hospital—which is a magnificent hospital, and has the great advantage of having its own transport—came down to the station, and took these men away. I believe that two of the men died afterwards. I do not know that I want to argue the case further with the Under Secretary of State for War. He has given a contrast between the personnel in South Africa on the 15th January and that on the 15th June. By the 15th June the tragedy was over. It is no use to quote the number of people there on the 15th June. What I want to know, and what the Committee and the country want to know, is when these people went out. It throws no light on the occurrence to tell us that there were so many people there on the 15th June. My whole point is that we have not been prepared, that there has been no prevision. I think that point ought to have been answered by stating whether, on the 1st March—to take a very easy date—there was a personnel in South Africa sufficient for the requirements of the situation. If the hon. Gentleman can tell me that, I, as a loyal member of his party, should be only too glad to hear it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): He has told you.

MR. WYNDHAM was understood to say he had not the figures for any particular date, but that he had already given one figure with regard to the 16th April, and that medical equipment and personnel had proceeded on the same scale throughout—namely, 10 per cent. of beds to the numbers despatched to South Africa.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I am glad to have made this point clear. I shall be all the happier if we can localise the responsibility for these deficiencies in South Africa. My own personal opinion is that the fault lay not here, but in South Africa. But I think I was within my right in calling attention to the fact that to contrast the number there on the 15th January with the number there on the 15th June does not really answer the question whether they were there in time. The epidemic and the great pressure was in the month of May. I have come back to Bloemfontein. I will not pause on the long journey between there and Cape Town. With regard to Cape Town, as I found it on my second visit in the first week in June, I have not a very favourable report to make. The two general hospitals at Wynberg had been admirable, and, I think, remained so. The normal number of patients in each was 520, but they had been extended so that at one time one accommodated 1,400 and the other 1,200 patients. The staff and nurses of No. 2 hospital at Wynberg have now been ordered to Bloemfontein, with the result that the twenty-five nurses in No. 1 hospital have now to attend to the 2,000 patients at present in both hospitals. There again, it seems to me, with hundreds and almost thousands of nurses in this country ready and willing and anxious to go out to South Africa, a position of that sort might have been relieved by a little care and attention on the part of the authorities. A Convalescent Home had been established at Maitland Camp, about two miles from Cape Town. I have urged throughout the establishment of Convalescent Homes in order to relieve the hospitals of their patients. I visited that at Maitland Camp, then only just established, and these are my notes. "Saw convalescents in new huts. There are huts erected for 150 men—ten huts—but they are bare and miserable. There are no beds or conveniences, and the men lie in blankets on the floor. How far these men are convalescent I cannot say; I found several of them in bed at three o'clock in the afternoon. The ordinary idea of an Army convalescent is that he is a man fit for duty. I found one of these a man in the Australian Horse, with a very high temperature and quick pulse. He had had enteric and bronchitis, and spoke with difficulty. He had been at Wynberg for a few days, and was then sent on to Maitland Camp. He was formerly at No. 9 at Bloemfontein"—which happens to be the general hospital I described. Another man was suffering from dysentery. He was on a milk diet, and had had no milk for four days. All this was happening within two miles of Cape Town, where every convenience might have been provided. Now, who were these people in charge of? They were in charge of a sergeant—not a trained sergeant of the Army Medical Corps, but an untrained man, himself recovering from enteric. I had a long talk with him. He told me no doctor attended them unless he (the sergeant) went for him. Therefore it was left for this untrained man, knowing nothing at all about medicine, to say whether the man on the floor required a doctor. After a conversation with the man on the floor I sent a doctor to him, but the sergeant did not know that he wanted one. I afterwards heard that he was dangerously ill. In the same camp there is an institution called the Yeomanry Hospital. I want to distinguish this entirely from the magnificent hospital at Deelfontein, which is one of the best managed and ordered hospitals it is possible to see. The one in Maitland Camp is called the Yeomanry Hospital because it is filled with Yeomanry patients; it holds fifty patients. It consists of one Cape hut with 6 inches of draught under its roof, and six bell tents, one tortoise tent, one doctor, and no trained nurses of any kind, orderlies or otherwise.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Has the Yeomanry hospital at Maitland any connection with that at Deelfontein?

*MR. BURDETT COUTTS: It has nothing to do with the Yeomanry hospital at Deelfontein, which, as I have said, is excellent. There is one thing I must call attention to here. There was a hospital at Cape Town, on my first visit, which was a disgrace to any army or any community, called the Woodstock. The building in which it was housed was an old building, condemned over and over again, yet it was taken to be used as a hospital for the troops who arrived from England in the transports sick. Everybody who came off a transport ill was put into this hospital. It was a horrible place, and full of vermin. I will read you a passage from a letter written by a surgeon-general, which appeared in The Times this morning—

"As regards the 'Woodstock' Hospital he speaks the truth. The building is a discredit to any Government. When I reported on it in 1894, I stated that it was situated on the sea shore, that close in front one of the main sewers of Cape Town discharged its contents, which were driven back on the beach when the wind set that way, and sent a stench through the wards so bad that it was frequently necessary to close the windows.

"Immediately behind ran the railway. On the right, within a couple of hundred yards, is the military cemetery; on the left some open ground, the resort of the bad characters of Cape Town.

"As regards vermin, I say there were none present during my incumbency, though the Cape Town barracks swarmed with bugs."

Now in spite of its situation this hospital has been taken as a centre to create and establish around it a large tented hospital. Anything more injudicious than to choose such a position, when you have miles and miles of beautiful suburbs around Cape Town, I cannot conceive. I have only one more remark to make. The Under Secretary for War referred to the fact that no other accounts had come home of all these imperfections. I do not think that is absolutely true; but I want to point out to the Committee—and this is a very important point—that we have had a great many favourable accounts of, a great many letters have appeared in the papers from patients in hospitals who have been well treated. But I want to point out that those letters coming from other places dated at other times with regard to favourable treatment can do anything to shake the specific statements which I have made. With regard to the correspondents, when the Under Secretary of State referred to the fact that there were no accounts from the war correspondents, someone interpolated the words "Press Censor." The right hon. Gentleman replied that letters were not censored. All I have to say is that if a correspondent wrote and published a letter showing the sort of thing I have shown, and its purport was telegraphed back there within perhaps two weeks and a-half, I should not envy the position of that man as a war correspondent, the performance of whose duty largely depends upon the authorities whose conduct he might have impugned. There is one other point with regard to evidence. I do not deny it, and I think it is a very good trait in the British soldier — that he is very sensitive with regard to sickness. He does not like to make complaint with regard to his treatment in hospital. In the first place, he is even ashamed of being sick. Then he does not want to be thought namby-pamby, and does not want to be talked about for having made complaints as to his treatment in hospital. It is a sort of esprit de corps amongst them. Moreover in the old days there was in the ranks an absolute terror of the authorities in the hospital. I do not know if any such feeling exists now in the Army, but I believe the tradition of it still prevails. Sir, you will get plenty of evidence when men know that it is not unmanly, that it is not cowardly, and that it is not unpatriotic to come forward and tell the truth in this matter; and when they are assured that it is their bounden duty to their comrades, to their country and themselves, in order that these things may be remedied and may not recur. I have not troubled the Committee with any of the innumerable letters I have received, but I cannot refrain from reading one short letter I received this morning, dealing with this point—

"Dear Sir,—I arrived in England the 10th of this month, being invalided home from Africa, having had enteric. I feel very pleased, and must thank you very much for the plucky manner by which you have exposed the state of things which existed at Bloemfontein. I am one of those that must consider myself lucky in having lived to get back to dear old England, and can give my evidence as a proof of what you have written, for I laid on the ground for three weeks without a change. If you consider my evidence of any use, I should be pleased to give it you at any time; at the present I trust you will keep my name anonymous, as my term of service has not expired and am on sick furlough."

I call attention to the last words. I hope at any rate that this House of Commons, which is higher than any Department or authority in this country, will be willing to see that any such man who comes forward is protected, and that his future is not prejudiced by reason of the story he has to tell. I must apologise most humbly for having detained the Committee all this time. I have not said half of what I wanted to say, but I presume that I have said enough to show that there has been disorganisation, and a want of prevision, and a want of proper management somewhere. I am not myself inclined to think that the blame rests upon the individual personnel of the Army Medical Corps; I feel pretty certain that it does not. I am afraid it rests upon a system which is entirely inelastic, and from deficiencies in that system which result in unnecessary want of prevision. I do not wish, and I do not intend, to lay blame upon individuals, or to lay it all upon the Army medical system. I feel myself that the policy which has governed the question of transport has not shown sufficient consideration for the needs of the sick. I cannot but say that; otherwise the whole responsibility would rest upon the Army Medical Corps. To go back once more to the question of evidence, I say with pain that my best evidence lies in South Africa, in the men who are buried there, brave men, many of whom, I believe, if a different system had prevailed, would have returned to their homes and their friends. It has been a notable war. In a few days I hope it will have been a successful war. I do not know whether it has been a glorious war. [Cries of "No, no!"] Yes! It has been made glorious by the bravery of these men on whose behalf I speak here—the men and their regimental officers. But for my part, having seen what I have seen, its darker side will ever be present to my mind. I shall think always of those silent, though not, I hope, forgotten, witnesses, men to whom we can raise but one real monument—the determination that such errors as I have described shall never occur again.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): The two interesting speeches to which we have listened to-night have been made in a somewhat different order to that usually adopted in debate. I am sorry that that order was observed. I am sorry for the logical sequence that the hon. Member below the Gangway spoke after the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War. It appeared to me that the hon. Gentleman practically admitted the chief of the contentions that were raised by the hon. Member for Westminster, and, admitting the conditions, he rather pleaded that the difficulty of transport and the enormous distance that had to be covered were an explanation and an excuse for these evils, and in apologising for them intimated that they were unavoidable incidents of a terrible and prolonged war. I cannot admit that the evils described by the hon. Member for Westminster were inevitable. They were, I think, all foreseen, and might have been prevented or provided for, and I make these remarks because I think there would be similar incidents in every campaign if steps were not taken to prevent them. Hon. Members are aware that we lost a large number of officers and men in the Egyptian campaign through enteric fever, but few are aware that the medical officers in that campaign who sent in certificates as to enteric fever were snubbed. This most terrible pest was absolutely kept from the public records, the system of the War Office being to discourage a medical officer who returned a case of enteric fever instead of returning it as continued fever or fever. Knowing that, I was anxious that the Government should take steps to prevent similar action and similar loss of life in the war. I do not think it is the fault of the Army Medical Corps that these things occur. Every officer of the Army Medical Corps has forces to contend with that are unknown here, and he would be stronger if he had some independent assistance to look into these matters from the outside. The War Office would have done the best thing for the army in Africa and saved hundreds of lives if they had sent to South Africa some independent authority in the shape of a small sanitary commission to intervene between the military commanders and the medical officers on matters of sanitation. The military commanders are of course anxious to do everything they can for the soldiers, and I do not think the losses we have had in South Africa from typhoid fever—the most terrible scourge that armies have to contend with—are due to Lord Roberts. These terrible losses in South Africa must have been foreseen, and anyone who knows anything of the history of such outbreaks might have foretold it. We had an epidemic of it in Ladysmith before it was relieved, and we all remember the letter of Mr. Treves, in which he said he found 800 cases amongst the invested army. We had the greatest stress of the epidemic at Bloemfontein, and everyone who knew the conditions that arose before Bloemfontein knew that within three or four weeks of the surrender at Paardeberg there would be an outbreak of fever at Bloemfontein, for the reason that the soldiers there were obliged to drink the water of the Modder River, poisoned by all the refuse from Cronje's laager. Within three or four weeks there was certain to be an outbreak. The result was that the death-rate from sickness, which in February and the beginning of March had varied between 120 and 90 a week, went up to 180 three weeks after the Paardeberg incident—exactly the time typhoid takes to develop. That figure has nothing to do with wounds. It has simply to do with disease, and it represents a condition of things which any medical man could have foretold.

MR. WYNDHAM: It was foretold.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: If it was foretold, then more preparation ought to have been made. And we would not have had cases of sick men being without doctors, of one doctor having to attend 300 men, of fifteen men being in a single bell tent suffering from a disease which makes their condition so horrible. Anyone knows that with fifteen men placed in a small tent in such conditions, the ground must have been saturated with discharges to such a degree as to make it a perfect pest-house. If that condition of things was foretold, as we are assured it was, then it ought to have been provided for. The same thing occurred after the unfortunate incident at the Bloemfontein Waterworks. The loss of good water entailed the use of bad water, and within six or seven weeks we had the terrible death-rate of 370, as compared with 90 in the early stages of the campaign. And only when the troops were moved out of Bloemfontein and went northwards to Kroonstad, to find the medical arrangements no better there, but the sanitary conditions less poisonous, did we find the general mortality becoming less. In this disease the conditions always become better when you change camp. In the old days the Romans prevented the spread of fever by changing camp frequently. One of the great causes of the mortality was the detention of the men at Bloemfontein drinking the contaminated surface water. I have said that if we had some means of bringing pressure to bear on the authorities such as I have described, the foresight which did exist amongst the medical officers might have received more attention and they might have had more done in the way of giving relief to the sick and suffering who were placed under the conditions so graphically described by the hon. Member for Westminster. All that the hon. Member had said has been practically admitted by the Under Secretary for War, and it has been confirmed from other sources. Not long since, Mr. Bowlby, of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, who was in charge of the Portland hospital, in South Africa, wrote home that, in spite of utilising many public buildings, the field hospitals rapidly became overcrowded, so that they had to accommodate three or four times the number for which they were equipped, and it became impossible to treat or nurse the patients satisfactorily. Of all maladies, the one that requires not only space and pure air, but careful and constant nursing, is enteric or typhoid fever, and I think it is the highest compliment, not to the arrangements, but to the salubrity of the South African climate that the mortality has not been greater. If we had had the patients in England under the same conditions of overcrowding in a pestilential atmosphere the mortality would have been much greater. Then we have had further confirmation of the statements of the hon. Member for Westminster from Surgeon-General Hamilton in The Times of to-day. Surgeon-General Hamilton was at one time principal medical officer in Cape Colony, and he stated that the criticisms of the hon. Member carried on the face of them evidence of their truth. So that we are bound to accept these statements as giving a fairly accurrate account of the horrible conditions which had existed among our soldiers in South Africa. Seeing that these things were foretellable, and that they were foreseen to some extent, I do not think we have had any adequate explanation of why they were not provided against. If trains could run up in the manner they did with general supplies, surely some could have been taken to provide medical necessaries for these unfortunate soldiers. I do not think that the record which the hon. Gentleman gives us as to the cause of that state of things is satisfactory. The hon. Gentleman has said he is satisfied that in no previous campaign had the sufferings been more mitigated. I do not think we can admit that with reference to the sufferings of those whose condition has been described by the hon. Member for Westminster; but the mitigation of suffering is a totally different thing from the death-rate. He tried to make out that the death-rate being low, there was mitigation of suffering, but we have incontrovertible evidence that the suffering was such as has been described. But if we go into the question of death-rate we find that even that is not altogether satisfactory. According to Lord Roberts, the death-rate in this campaign from enteric or typhoid is 21 per cent. In the Nile campaign, where there was the same painful lack of foresight, the same lack of nurses and of provision for hospitals, it was 28 per cent.; but there we had the disease occurring under climatic conditions very much less favourable than those which exist in South Africa. In Natal itself, when we had an epidemic of this disease a few years ago, the death-rate was only 16 per cent., which is considerably less than in the present campaign. Speaking generally, the death-rate from this disease throughout this country is only from 12 to 16 per cent., or possibly 17 per cent. in the case of the worst epidemics. But the comparison of all these death-rates is full of fallacy, because no two typhoid epidemics have the same death-rate. It varies from year to year, and from season to season. And therefore, though it is higher than it ought to be, it is difficult to make a comparison with what it should have been under proper conditions. I believe myself that if these unfortunate people in South Africa had been nursed and cared for properly, the death-rate might have been reduced from 21 to 12 per cent. I stake my professional reputation on the statement that under these favourable conditions the death-rate might have been lessened by nearly one-half. We have also had evidence, which has not been contradicted, as to the inadequacy of the provision of hospital accommodation. The hon. Gentleman says that the War Office provided beds for from 8 to 10 per cent. of the total force of the Army in South Africa. On this question there is some difference of opinion amongst sanitary authorities. In this case the difficulty was that the 8 or 10 per cent. of beds was not on the spot when they were wanted. If they had been the overcrowding and mortality from disease would not have reached the pitch it did at Bloemfontein. Professor Parkes, the greatest authority, said that more than 10 per cent. was wanted for the sick and wounded in a time of war, and Professor De Chaumont placed it at 25 per cent. I am sure myself that the proportion of 10 per cent. of beds is not an adequate provision for the amount of sickness likely to be engendered in the conditions which exist in South Africa. There is another point I would like to mention. The mortality from this disease in South Africa has been less than in many previous campaigns, but it has been greater than it was in previous epidemics in Natal, and I think it is greater than that which occurred during the Spanish-American War, in which every man among the American troops practically went into hospital twice during the campaign. The admissions to hospital were over 2,000 per 1,000. In one of the most disastrous campaigns in recent history, that of the French against the Hovas in Madagascar, the mortality from typho-malaria was less than amongst our troops in South Africa. I want to point out that this condition of things is preventible. The late Dr. Parkes, the highest authority we had in this country, more than once said that this disease could be prevented. I cannot do better than read his words—

"Enteric, or typhoid, fever ought certainly to be prevented in a camp, and recent experience in Afghanistan, South Africa, and Egypt shows what ravages enteric fever can make, and how rapidly it becomes generated and spreads in camp, especially when the men are mostly young."

Then he says—

"This is certainly due to improper hygienic measures."

That is written in the leading text-book by the highest authority in this country, and I say one of the first duties of every administrative body connected with the health of the Army is to foresee and to prevent an outbreak of that disease. I believe that if the Government had shown more foresight in this matter the lives of hundreds of those gallant fellows who went out to fight our battles might have been saved. My opinion is that the evil has arisen from the cheese-paring policy of the War Office in regard to the Army Medical Department in years gone by. They have been cutting it down and interfering with it in many ways, making the service unpopular and reducing it below its proper strength. One of the late directors general of the Army Medical Department, Sir Thomas Crawford, laid it down that 890 medical officers was perilously low for a peace establishment. We have heard to-day from the hon. the Under Secretary for War that when we are approaching the conclusion of the war we have not 890 medical men in the service, and yet we have a larger army in the field under the colours of the Queen than ever within the memory of any man in this House. I say that that is a cheese-paring policy, and that it was bound to bring with it the disasters which had resulted in the terrible ravages of disease exposed by the hon. Member for Westminster, and which have even been admitted by the Government. I hope the policy of the Government will be changed, and that they will provide against these things in the future. The hon. Member has said nothing about the suggestion made by Lord Roberts, that some Commission should be appointed now that the injury has been done. Even now such a Commission might do good. I hope to hear before the debate concludes that there will be an inquiry.

MR. WYNDHAM: I said so yesterday.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: We have not heard it to-day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Once is enough.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I hope we will hear more details on this point before the close of the debate.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: I ask the permission of the Committee to say a few words on this very important matter. I only do so because, when in South Africa for three months this year, I did my best to make myself acquainted with all the arrangements for the sick and wounded. I admit I was not so long there as the hon. Member for Westminster, and that I went no further north than Paardeberg; and therefore I cannot enter into his criticisms in regard to the hospitals at Bloemfontein or Kroonstaad. I am quite sure that Lord Roberts will weigh all the hon. Member's statements with the utmost care, and do everything he possibly can to ascertain the exact truth. I am sorry to say that the hon. Gentleman seems to have seen everything in South Africa through the darkest possible spectacles. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] We have heard nothing but the most harrowing details it was possible for him to give to the Committee.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: May I call the attention of the Committee to the fact that I published a series of articles, six of which have been devoted to presenting to the public the most favourable possible picture of the work done by the Royal Army Medical Corps?

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: It is greatly to be regretted that the hon. Member did not sign his name to these articles in the same way that he has done to the very violent article which appeared in The Times of the day before yesterday. It is only now we are able to know who is the author of the previous letters. All that we have to deal with to-day has nothing to do with anonymous letters, but only with a signed letter, and the speech which the hon. Gentleman has made to the Committee this afternoon. I have no desire to do any injustice to my hon. friend. I am sure he is actuated by the very best of motives, but I am not exaggerating when I say that he has presented to us a very dark picture of what he has seen.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: At Bloemfontein.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: The hon. Member gave us harrowing details about other hospitals at Cape Town, at Maitland, and of the Yeomanry hospital, which I know quite as well as he does. I am not going, however, to enter into any personal controversy with him. All I desire to do, if the Committee are kind enough to allow me, is to give the result of my observations at the hospitals I visited. I may be wrong, or the hon. Gentleman may be wrong. The Committee have heard the hon. Gentleman. I will give the other side of the picture, I hope with moderation, and without any exaggeration or other desire than to lead the Committee to a right conclusion on the point. I was interested in this matter on several personal grounds. I quite recognise that in every campaign of late, and every civilian in the country will admit it, much has been done to mitigate the horrors of war. Within a few hours of my arrival in Cape Town I called on Surgeon-General Wilson. I found in him a man of great energy and activity, of warm sympathy, and without the slightest prejudice or desire to be bound by red tape, or by any system which could possibly improve the condition of affairs. Although I had no introduction to or previous acquaintance with him, he said to me—

"Go everywhere and make inquiry. You can go into the hospitals at any time, and every information that can possibly be afforded is at your service, and if you desire to see me again you can do so."

He gave written authority to visit the large base hospitals and a considerable number of stationary and field hospitals. I visited the hospitals at Cape Town, Pietermaritzburg, Ladysmith, Kimberley, and elsewhere. This was in February, and it would be very surprising if from that time they had gone so much to the bad as the hon. Member for Westminster would lead us to imagine. I do not think that anything could possibly be better than the provision for the sick and wounded during the month of February, when I was visiting the different hospitals. On 27th June the hon. Member said there were in South Africa two plagues, the plague of blindness and the plague of whitewash. I do not think I am quite blind, and there is no reason whatever why I should lend a hand at whitewashing. I do not think I have ever shown in speech or otherwise any desire to stifle inquiry. On the contrary, I have determined to do everything that possibly can be done to enforce the lessons of the war. No one would say that the Army Medical Department is absolutely perfect. There is some truth in the statement of the hon. Member for Ilkeston that there has been too much cheeseparing in the past. But that is not a matter for which the present Government is responsible, any more than their predecessors. In a way they have not attracted the very best students from the medical schools into the Army; but no one could possibly exaggerate the heroism the Royal Army Medical Corps have shown under fire, their devotion to their duty, and their desire to do the best they possibly could under the circumstances. A great deal has been done lately to improve the position of the officers of the Royal Army Medical Corps. They have been given increased pay and allowances and the titular rank which they have been wanting for a very long time. It was pleasant to hear from the officers of the Royal Army Medical Corps in all parts of South Africa that they were perfectly satisfied with their condition, and the consideration given to them, not only by their equals in the combatant branch of the service, but by the general officers and others in authority. There are many things that may be done to improve the knowledge and ability of the Royal Army Medical Department. They ought not only to be encouraged, but they should be obliged to attend for a certain number of months some modern metropolitan hospital in order that they should keep up to date. I have been informed by a registrar of an hospital, an officer who sucked the poison from the throat of an enteric patient, that there is no such thing as military surgery. It is an emergency surgery, and the Army Medical Department should keep itself up to date. In this war the Government invited and accepted the services of Sir William MacCormac, Sir William Stokes, Mr. Treves, Mr. Cheyne, and other distinguished surgeons who were sent out to assist the military surgeons. Then 400 civilian surgeons were attached to the Royal Army Medical Corps. These had rendered the greatest possible service in performing many wonderful operations and superintending others which were thought almost impossible a short time ago, and they had given the greatest comfort and assistance to men who were suffering. I believe that those gentlemen are better aware of the state of affairs in South Africa as regards medical matters than any man without any personal experience of them. I saw the hospitals myself and the way in which the medical corps did their work, and when I heard from Sir William MacCormac that things were working perfectly, I believed him, though I had not seen everything, and if anybody is wrong in this matter it is not myself, but rather the hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster. With regard to Lord Roberts, whose name the hon. Gentleman mentioned, everyone who is acquainted with him knows perfectly well that there is nothing so dear to his heart as the care of the sick and the wounded. He never arrives at a base without inspecting the hospital, and he does not go with a large staff with great form and ceremony; he goes without any ceremony and converses with individual patients, sitting on their beds and doing his best not only to encourage the sick and wounded, but also to repair or remedy any defect which he sees in the organisation. In a few days Mr. Cheatle will arrive from Lord Roberts's headquarters; he had charge of the hospital in which were the worst cases. In those cases Lord Roberts took the greatest interest, and from Mr. Cheatle I heard that the first question Lord Roberts put to him at Paardeberg was, "What do you think of the condition of the transport of the wounded from Paardeberg to Modder River?" Everything that Lord Roberts could do to mitigate pain and suffering throughout this campaign he has done. I greatly regret that my hon. friend the Member for Westminster did not take the obvious and proper course when he found this condition of things existing at Bloemfontein and Kroonstad, and seek an interview with Lord Roberts and tell him of the state of things that existed. He did not tell us that he waited on Lord Roberts.

*Mr. BURDETT-COUTTS: I did. I called on Lord Roberts the day after I arrived at Bloemfontein, and I made two other attempts to see him.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT: You never said so.

*Mr. BURDETT-COUTTS: And at Kroonstad I wrote to his military secretary, Major Cowan, a letter, bringing forward the defects which I had seen, and suggesting remedies. When I got back to Bloemfontein I wrote to the same gentleman another very strong and long letter.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT: I am in the recollection of the Committee, who will recollect that the hon. Member never said anything of the kind; therefore I have done a considerable service to the hon. Gentleman in giving him the opportunity of saying so. But I cannot conceive that Lord Roberts, who is accessible to everybody and anybody, would not see him. I am sure that any representations from the hon. Gentleman would be received with prompt consideration, and I cannot understand how it was that the hon. Gentleman failed to see Lord Roberts and put these matters right. Did he see Surgeon-General Wilson and tell him the result of his personal observation?

*Mr. BURDETT-COUTTS: Over and over again.

Sir HOWARD VINCENT: Then perhaps this accounts for the fact that at the very time the hon. Gentleman wrote this letter in Cape Town Surgeon-General Wilson was in Bloemfontein seeing to these things. I have had extreme difficulty in arriving at the truth in this matter. Although I am personally acquainted with hundreds of men in South Africa, I have not seen a letter of complaint as to treatment in hospital. One thing is pretty well known, and that is that if I had received any complaints I should have sifted the matter to the bottom; but I have not received a complaint of any sort or kind, though I receive letters from the front by every mail. The Lord Mayor of London has received no complaints; but the difficulty of arriving at the facts of this matter is illustrated by this one fact. I heard of two men who had been invalided home, and I telegraphed to them to see me here to-day. One man said that he only saw the doctor once for five minutes during the seven weeks he was in the hospital, whilst the other, a man who came home in the same ship, and who was in the same hospital at the same time, said the doctor attended regularly in the morning and in the evening. That shows the Committee the extreme difficulty of arriving at the truth. It does not do to take hearsay evidence in this matter. Why, I heard of one complaint of an enteric patient that all the food he got was a little milk and soda. I have had enteric myself, and everybody knows that that is the only diet you can have. The complaint went on to say that the patient would have starved unless he had been fed by those who were well. Everybody knows that the result of giving solid food to a typhoid patient would be almost certain to be fatal. With regard to the attendance, this man said there were no nurses. It was true there were no female nurses, but there were male attendants, and he thought the majority of the men preferred them to female nurses. That is only individual opinion, of course, and I only quote it as such. I then asked him if he had any complaint to make, and he said, of course, it was not comfortable, they were on the ground; but that he recognised the difficulty of the authorities, and did not complain. That is the evidence of individuals who have no interest in disguising the truth. There are hon. Members in this House who have had relatives at the front; some, to their great sorrow, have lost them. Is it likely that the relatives of hon. Members would not have written to them as to the condition of affairs if it is so black as is represented? Amongst them is the son of a Cabinet Minister. Is it not certain that he would write and complain? There have been passing through the hospitals 1,500 or 1,600 officers, and is it likely, if this condition of things existed, that they would not have written to Lord Lansdowne asking for an immediate inquiry? I do not wish to cast discredit on the observations of the hon. Member for Westminster. He has been actuated by the best of motives, but he has trusted too much to hearsay evidence.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: No.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: Then he has trusted too much to appearances, and has not perhaps made sufficient inquiry into the origin of things. At the same time, I am sure his only desire was to bring about the best conditions possible in the treatment and care of the sick and wounded. I am certain that every officer of the Army Medical Corps would spare no effort to bring those conditions about. If such a state of things as the hon. Member has depicted existed it would be the duty of the Government, and I am sure the Commander-in-Chief would not shirk that duty, to find out who was responsible. The Government have been charged with want of foresight; it has been said that they ought to have foreseen the epidemic at Bloemfontein; but I have been told by one who lived in Bloemfontein that a more salubrious town there could not be, and I do not think anyone could have foreseen such a thing. No one could have conceived such a state of affairs as I saw at Paardeberg, with the river filled with putrefying corpses. Everything in this war has turned out differently to what was expected, and if there has been any lack of foresight which stands conspicuously before the country, it is that of the Leader of the Opposition and those who support him. He has published statements to the country, and the country will be able to judge whether everything has been done which it was possible for the Government and private munificence to accomplish. I hope my hon. friend, instead of writing sensational letters and making sensational speeches, will devote his abilities and leisure to improving the condition of affairs and doing all he can to provide for the better care of the sick and wounded.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean) said that if the conduct of the hon. Member for Westminster was open to any charge, it was not the charge which had been made by the hon. Member who last addressed the Committee. He believed that the result of the inquiry would be to show that the circumstances which the hon. Member for Westminster had pointed out as existing on one portion of the line of advance existed on at least two other lines of advance. The last speaker had made an unfair attack on the hon. Member for not having signed the letters in The Times except the last letter but one. He knew nothing of the circumstances in which those letters were produced, but he pointed out that the earlier letters were mainly in defence of what the hon. Member had seen. It was therefore rather honourable on the part of the hon. Member that when he had to make definite charges and attacks he should have promptly added his name to the letter. The hon. Member for Sheffield attacked the hon. Member for Westminster for having brought a charge against the management of the hospitals at the Cape. Of all the heavy charges brought by the hon. Member against the Army medical system, he thought that the charges with regard to the Cape were the heaviest of all, because none of the excuses necessarily made as to the limitations imposed by Lord Kitchener on transport prevailed here. When Lord Rosebery took the chair at the dinner in April he said that "our medical and hospital service has been perfect," and he proceeded to give the whole credit for that perfection to the Government which had organised the system. But those hon. Members who for years past had called attention to the deficiency of the system had shown that a breakdown would occur. At the time Lord Rosebery thought our system perfect the epidemic of enteric had not reached the high level now known. But we did know of what occurred at Intombi camp and Stormberg, and when the inquiry was held it would be found that the same facts which had been alleged with regard to Cape Town and Bloemfontein had also to be alleged with regard to General Gatacre's line of advance, and he thought the inquiry would also reveal that the breakdown had been general. Now, of course, war was always horrible, but the unnecessary horrors of war which were easily preventible naturally and properly shocked the public even more. In his opinion the hon. Member for Westminster had proved beyond doubt that in the rapid advance Lord Kitchener cut down unduly the transport for the sick, and as regards Cape Town the absolutely preventible suffering which had been described would also shock the conscience of the country. He did not charge the War Office with a policy of direct concealment, but he must say they seemed not to want to know too much. Personally he had asked questions of the Under Secretary of State for War with regard to circumstances which were well known to himself on information which he had from sources beyond all question as to the very horrible state of things prevailing at the Intombi hospital. The answers to these questions showed disinclination to press for reports or to obtain information. He had asked specifically about Intombi Camp. It was claimed in The Times that day, in a letter from one high in the secrets of the medical service, that that camp was placed under the charge of the best man they had got, and that that man, having done so well there, was then sent on to Bloemfontein and was responsible, as he understood, for some of the hospitals described by the hon. Member. The organisation of the medical department of the War Office had been year by year before the House, and the complaints made had turned mainly on the shortness of supply of trained orderlies, which had been the definite cause of the breakdown in this war. They had never been told in Parliament of the nature of the working arrangement established between the Government and the Red Cross Society. He understood from what he had heard that there was a working arrangement in imitation of the Prussian system. They were told that these breakdowns had occurred in all previous wars. He would point to the circumstances of the last war in which the Prussian army engaged. In 1870, after fighting two days, separated only by one day (16th—18th August), the losses were gigantic. The Prussian losses were greater than the French. There were actually 40,000 men, partly French, brought in by the Prussian ambulances in fifty or sixty hours, and under the joint system in operation for the treatment of the wounded there was not the slightest hitch. The system worked like clock-work and nothing went wrong. That was a case of perfect organisation in a successful war. Afterwards in the beaten French army, with a confluent smallpox epidemic to deal with, there was equally no breakdown until the snow began. In the case which had been referred to by the hon. Member for Westminster, and also by the hon. Member for the Ilkeston Division, the circumstances ought to have been absolutely foreseen. It was not like the outbreak of smallpox in France. It was a case where enteric fever was to be presumed to exist on a large scale, as was shown in the Report of the Army Medical Department for 1898, and the figures there given of mortality at Ladysmith before the war and with a small garrison, and the statement specifically made that enteric fever in South Africa was assuming grave proportions, especially in Natal. It was associated with polluted soil and the pollution of the Klip River. The utter breakdown at the Intombi Camp was, in his view, an even greater scandal than the facts revealed by the hon. Member for Westminster. The Under Secretary said that Sir George White was not responsible for that camp, but it was a camp for which the British military authorities were responsible, and they held at least one court-martial in regard to the proceedings which took place there. In the hospital at Intombi robbery took place on an enormous scale. Stimulants were stolen and consumed, and the tinned milk on which the lives of the typhoid patients depended was also stolen and sold. He ventured to say that deaths which occurred among the typhoid patients in the Intombi hospital in the latter portion of the siege were directly due to the robbery of the stores at the commencement of the siege. One court-martial was held, and one man was reduced in rank and sentenced to imprisonment. Although an opponent of capital punishment, he should have been glad if the man had been shot, because the shooting of a man or two for such offences was likely to do good to the British Army in time of war. It was likely to show people as nothing else would the great dishonour of offences of that kind, and that they were not to be allowed to go on in future campaigns. They could not insist too strongly on good management in these matters on which the lives of our soldiers depend as much as on military skill pure and simple.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport) said that as one interested in the welfare of soldiers, he had a feeling of sympathy with anyone who showed up a system under which soldiers suffered. He had at the same time a great disinclination to go against anyone representing properly-constituted authority. He approached this question, therefore, with no intention whatever of finding severe fault with the hon. Member for Westminster, who had apparently been actuated by good intentions. He thought the hon. Member for Westminster had in some measure damaged his own case. Instead of confining himself simply to pointing out the state of things that existed during the short period that he was at Bloemfontein, the hon. Member seemed to find it necessary to attack the whole conduct of affairs by those in supreme command in South Africa, and some of them were driven to choose between his opinion and that of Lord Roberts and those who acted under him. The hon. Member had, he thought, mistakenly chosen to suggest that a great portion of the administration of affairs there was wrong, and that things were done that ought not to have been done. Although he sympathised with the hon. Member in his desire to see everything done for the sick and wounded, he must say that he would prefer the dispositions of Lord Roberts to those of the hon. Gentleman. He did not understand exactly what was the position occupied by the hon. Member. It would add very much to the difficulties which surrounded the Commander-in-Chief if he was supposed to be at the beck and call of every itinerant sightseer who went to the front.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: My position was that of special correspondent of The Times, not entitled to use the military wire.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY still failed to see how the commanding officer was not to have his action considerably hampered if he was supposed to be always at the beck and call of even a correspondent of The Times, or of any other amateur, whether male or female. The Government had not disputed the fact that at Bloemfontein for a certain time there was a sad and grievous breakdown of the hospital arrangements, but they had explained that it was unavoidable, in consequence of there being but one line of communications. Unless they were in a position to say that Lord Roberts should have postponed the bringing up of men, guns, and supplies until the hospital stores were brought up, they were not justified in challenging the defence which the Government had made. The outburst of fever at Bloemfontein could not have been prevented by the hon. Member for Ilkeston, or any other member of his profession, unless, indeed, they had been able to prevent the Boers from throwing their dead into the Modder and to undertake the sanitary arrangements around Paardeberg. That and that only would have prevented the outbreak of enteric fever at Bloemfontein. That should be borne in mind in dealing fairly and properly with this question. Let them by all manner of means take steps that errors and mistakes do not occur again, but do not let them be misled into the idea of thinking that in any campaign it would be possible under all circumstances to prevent entirely such a condition of things as took place at Bloemfontein. Unless they provided more than one line of communication, and made the base much nearer where they wished to use the supply, they must and always would be face to face with possibilities of some such unfortunate occurrences as those at Bloemfontein. His hon. friend the Member for Central Sheffield laid considerable stress on the divergence of testimony on these points. He thought the Committee would be pretty well satisfied that with the best endeavours in the world they would not be able to arrive at a definite conclusion. The wife of a well known and esteemed Member of the House had been very much before public notice lately on account of the part she had taken in the working and organisation of one of the hospitals sent out to South Africa. That lady had been speaking at a gathering in her own county, and her remarks formed a curious commentary on the speech of the hon. Member for Westminster. [Cries of "Name!"] He referred to Mrs. Bagot. She said—

"At the time of the epidemic at Bloemfontein she could not estimate fewer in the hospitals than 5,500 patients, and it was almost impossible to cope with such overwhelming numbers. There was one general hospital for 500 beds which had 1,700 patients crowded into it; another 1,600. The Portland Hospital had to stretch out its numbers from 100 to 150, and all other voluntary hospitals in the same proportion. One field hospital, intended for 100 men, to her certain knowledge at one time had over 400 patients, lying mostly on the ground. But what could they do in a place where the only communication was a small railway line, by which everything required at the front, including food, horses, and men, etc., had to be brought? It was amazing that Lord Roberts was able to provide food for his men and horses during the whole of that anxious period. Despite the sufferings of the wounded and the sick, she never heard so much as a murmur or a complaint. As to the Government hospitals, they had done magnificent work. The staffs were simply untiring and devoted, and the patients were in every case as well looked after as was possible."

He thought he was justified in reading that expression of opinion from a fairly competent authority. [An HON. MEMBER: It is corroboration.] He joined issue with the hon. Gentleman opposite. He considered contradiction what the hon. Member considered corroboration. It had been shown that as far as human foresight could go every possible effort was made to deal with these matters. It was clear that the relatives and friends of those engaged in the campaign had no right to accuse the Government of any lukewarmness.

*DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I am very glad that we have had this debate, but I am bound to say that it has been to me a very sad and painful one, because I had looked upon the Army Medical Department work as the one bright spot in the many dark clouds which have passed over our military operations in South Africa, and it is a great and grievous disappointment to me to find that there has been this breakdown, assuming, of course, that the statements of the hon. Member for Westminster will bear the test of the examination to which they will be submitted. I am very glad that the First Lord of the Treasury was able to accept the idea of sending out to the seat of military operations a band of skilled physicians and sanitarians who will be able to give that substantial aid to the doctors out there which I think they require in order to hold their own and to meet the military necessities of the moment. My hon. friend has confessed that there have been grave drawbacks and difficulties at the front, and we hope, therefore, that this inquiry will be made a full, complete, and searching one, and that they will be able to put the saddle on the right horse. The hon. Member for Westminster has brought a series of indictments against the Army

Medical Department in South Africa. In a speech of two hours duration it is quite impossible to grasp the situation, and those of us who have not been to South Africa are not able to give an opinion as to how these things are working. I am bound to say, in justice to the Army Medical Department, that in spite of all these difficulties and complications, it is only right that we should judge them by results. The Under Secretary of State for War has stated to the Committee the very remarkable results in the case of typhoid fever. He has shown that the death-rate amongst enteric patients was only between 20 and 21 per cent., and I may say that that would be considered a fairly good ratio of success even in a London hospital, provided with all the attributes of modern civilisation; but out in South Africa, with bad sanitary conditions, no beds, and very little comfort, with everything going wrong, and with all the conditions of treatment considered by medical science to be necessary, we have better results than have ever before been attained in any large campaign, and the rate of mortality compares favourably with our military hospitals at home. I think the success which has been attained in this respect is truly remarkable and very creditable to those concerned. We have to remember the serious injury which expansive bullets had inflicted, for the use of these bullets by the Boers has been proved beyond doubt. I think that the ratio of success of from 90 to 95 per cent. in the treatment of the wounded is a testimony to the devotion and skill of the Army Medical Department. Much of this success has been due to the skilful way in which the first dressings were carried out on the field of battle. Of course the further treatment and dressings had to be carried out not only by the medical staff but by the skilled surgeons whom my hon. friend and his colleagues have sent out to the seat of war. I take exception to some of the statements contained in my hon. friend's letter. The hon. Member for Westminster has sneered at the opinions expressed by Sir William MacCormac and Mr. Treves at the dinner given in their honour when they came back to this country, after an arduous campaign. We are bound, I suppose, to admit that certain difficulties have occurred in the management of affairs out in South Africa, and what we have to consider is who is to blame and how much of what has happened was avoidable. I am very glad that my hon. friend has paid a tribute to the devotion of the Army Medical Department. These men had to go out on the field of battle night after night, and I hope this House will recognise in every possible way that whoever is to blame, at all events the doctors on the spot, who were short-handed and working under very difficult conditions, are not in any way responsible for the condition of things which we all so much deplore. We have to find out exactly how the matter stands. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean seems to think that the Medical Department ought to have foreseen the awful conditions under which the troops have been obliged to serve, and the dangers of typhoid fever. If the water was contaminated with putrid masses of festering humanity typhoid, under those circumstances, would be unpreventible. I cannot free the Government from blame for not having foreseen the overwhelming possibility of a thing of this kind taking place, and for not remembering that a pestilence of this kind often dogged the footsteps of an army in the field. This outbreak of typhoid fever, although inevitable under the circumstances, might have been met a little more actively, and there might have been a little more completeness and elasticity in the arrangements made. I believe that the Government have sent out ample stores, but there has been a want of organisation in the distribution on the spot. It seems to me to be something like what occurs during an Indian famine—there may be plenty of corn in one place, but because there is none at all in a certain spot the people starve. No doubt part of these disasters may be due to a very old cause, and that is that commanding officers have not always taken the principal medical officer into their confidence as much as they might have done. Upon this point I might go into an historical retrospect, and I could show how the medical arrangements in one war completely broke down because the principal medical officer was not taken into the confidence of the commanding officer. I may be wrong in this instance, but such things have happened in the past, and it is just possible that a similar reason may apply in the present case. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Forest of Dean, and other hon. Members in this House, have repeatedly brought up the question of the undermanning of the Army Medical Staff. They have repeatedly complained that the Army Medical Department has been too hard worked, and that they do not get that opportunity of studying which is necessary in order to keep them acquainted with the modern conditions of medicine and surgery. The refusal to thank the Army Medical Department for what they did during the Soudan War stung them very deeply, for not a single word of appreciation was expressed for the work which they had performed. Lord Roberts sympathises deeply with the sick and the suffering, and he has expressed his enthusiastic desire to do the best he can for the soldiers suffering from disease in the field. My opinion is that, whereas the military authorities at the War Office underrated the fighting capacity of the Boers, they also underrated the fighting capacity of enteric fever. Enormous possibilities might arise during a war in a country like South Africa, although there are a good many extenuating circumstances connected with the question under discussion. I should like to think that all they do is for the best, and I quite believe that all the preparations made here by the director-general were good, but muddling took place in consequence of want of organisation out at the front. How far this was due to the military exigencies under which the chief of staff took the transport which ought to have gone to the doctors we do not know, but the enormous extent of the country and the rapidity of Lord Roberts's movements are, I think, extenuating circumstances which may induce us to take a different view from that taken by my hon. friend the Member for Westminster. The mobility of the enemy in South Africa and the extent of the country has not been perhaps so fully appreciated as they ought to have been by those who made the arrangements for the campaign. But however that may be, and whatever may be said about the arrangements, I want to say the doctors out there have done good work and have done the very best they could under very difficult conditions; and not only this, but they have attained a measure of success, both on the medical and the surgical side, which is absolutely unprecedented in the history of warfare, either ancient or modern. Whatever the faults may be, or on whoever you may place the responsibility, the doctors have done their work admirably, and in the treatment both of the wounded and of enteric patients they have achieved a result which is absolutely unknown in any campaign of former times. I am glad that we are going to have a full inquiry, and I think the hon. Member has done a public service in bringing this matter forward, although I do not admit many of his statements. The hon. Member says he has seen these things, and all we have to do now is to find out who is to blame, and then we can put the saddle on the right horse.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I agree with my hon. friend who has just spoken, that this debate must be, to a great extent, a very sad one to many of us, for we, nearly all of us, have close friends or relatives engaged in this war. A debate which in any way suggests that something has been left undone which might have alleviated the sufferings of those of our friends and near relatives must be a painful matter to consider at the present moment. I only wish to say one or two words, because I happened to be in South Africa when the war commenced, and I saw a good deal of what was going on during the early stages of the war in the Transvaal, the Orange Free State, Cape Colony, and Natal. I think it is idle to say that many mistakes were not made, for many things were left undone which might have been done. But we must remember that a very large war was sprung upon us, so to speak, and I think that it is a pity that we should exaggerate and emphasise those mistakes which have been so forcibly painted by the hon. Member for Westminster. War is a dreadful calamity, and perhaps it is an advantage that it is so, because it prevents nations from freely indulging in it. But after all, it is hardly fair to pick out isolated cases and paint them in vivid colours in the imagination of the public of this country, who are now grieving over the losses they have sustained, without also putting before them the other matters which the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for War has mentioned. After the rapid march from Paardeberg there is no doubt things were in a very serious condition, and enteric fever developed largely, as might have been expected. But anyone who, like myself, has travelled from Cape Town to Bloemfontein along the narrow li e of railway, and who considers the enormous effort that it must have been to convey what was absolutely necessary to keep the Army alive, can hardly wonder that during the first few weeks some branches were not served with provisions and other necessaries as well as we should have wished them to be. I travelled over that line myself before the war broke out. It is a very small and narrow line, and there is not only the difficulty of getting things up the line, but there is also the difficulty of getting the empty trucks back again to bring up another load. I agree most heartily that there should be a most careful investigation, not so much with the idea of proving anybody wrong, but of seeing if we can by any possible means, as was suggested by Lord Roberts, do something which may prevent any such sufferings or calamities occurring again. That seems to me to be the great object of this inquiry. When I was out in South Africa I saw one or two incidents, which I could paint and exaggerate, and possibly make as much of as I am sorry to say I think the hon. Member for Westminster has done. But I do think that, in discussing a question such as this, we must bear in mind the whole of the circumstances; and knowing the distance and the difficulties of transport, it does seem to me that we should dwell more upon the brilliant successes of some phases of hospital life at the front than on the mistakes which were made. It is satisfactory to think that in spite of the difficulties of long marches—and I dare say it is quite true that many of the men had no beds, and that appliances were not forthcoming—by the heroism of our Army Medical Department such very remarkable results have been achieved as those which have been alluded to. The hon. Member for Westminster referred to the absence of female nurses. That is a question which I think should be freely discussed and gone into with great care. I think in the early stages of the war enough was not thought of supplying female nurses. The orderly system is, after all, a rough-and-ready system, only justifiable when nothing further can be undertaken. I am glad that the Government are going to send out a Commission, particularly after what has been stated in the public press, because the public ought not to be left as things are with these statements before them. We must remember that if they have not themselves suffered, there is hardly a family which has not lost a member or a friend in this war, and if there has been any culpable negligence which has caused this great loss I think the nation should know of it. I have seen the country and know the distances and the difficulties, and I know Lord Roberts to be one of the most humane generals of the time, and we ought to hesitate in believing that there has been any neglect. The hon. Gentleman referred to a corpse being found in a hospital lavatory. Mentioning such a thing as that gives a certain jar to our feelings; but when one comes to consider it, it is a thing that might happen in the emergency of the moment and not be so bad as it seems to us, and I think to publish a statement of that kind to shock and upset the public in the way it has done was wrong. By all means inquire into everything that has been done, and let us know the worst, though I should have preferred to have waited until the war is over. What we want is that this investigation shall not be governed by vindictiveness in any way, or by party feeling, but solely with the idea to throw a brighter light upon this matter and to learn, if there have been blunders, from our experience in the past.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): Many hon. Gentlemen have found fault with the hon. Member for Westminster for exaggerating and drawing on his imagination and drawing lurid pictures of matters which it would have been better to have concealed. I do not agree with that at all. I think that he is entitled to the greatest credit for putting before the public that which he no doubt saw. I am as content to take his statement as to what he saw as I should be to take the statement of the hon. Member for Central Sheffield as to what he saw. One fact which shows the importance of the subject to which attention has been drawn is the question which was put upon the Paper this morning by the hon. Member for York, which showed that 5,000 officers and men died of disease, and that 18,000 were invalided; thus you have 23,000 officers and men put out of action by disease, and if that is not a fact justifying our attention I do not know what is. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster deserves the greatest credit not only for publicly describing what he saw, but for the facts which he has brought forward here. I believe he described as accurately what he saw as the hon. Member for Central Sheffield did what he saw; but they described different systems under different circumstances. The right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War in this debate said that in January there were 351 members of the Army medical service, assisted by 77 civilian doctors, sent from this country, and he told us that in June there were 456 Army doctors, and that 348 civilians had been sent out, and that other civilian doctors resident in South Africa were added in the later stages of the campaign. Now I do not wish to compare the abilities of Army and civilian doctors, but there is a lot of red tape in the Army. The hon. Gentleman told us that it would never do for a doctor to requisition this or that, he must go through the regular routine; the consequence is that when the Army doctor wants anything he knows where to get it; they can ruffle it with their military brethren and get what they want; but the unfortunate civilian who goes out cannot bring pressure to bear and is put aside. That would no doubt account for many of the difficulties existing to which the hon. Member referred. The Army Medical Department is totally inadequate to cope with our Army when in a state of war. It has been experienced by the Government again and again, and the utmost pressure has been brought to bear on the Government without adequate result. The hon. Member for Westminster in a number of statements, neither sensational nor exaggerated, seemed to me to point out a very grave defect in our system. He told us that in a certain hospital instead of twenty doctors there were only three; instead of, say, a score of trained orderlies there were only two or three, and that the others were untrained men, and he made reference to convalescent orderlies, that is to say men who had just recovered from illness, who were performing a duty for which they were physically unfit, and for which they had had no training, and which, owing to their not being in a good state of health, must have been neglected or improperly performed. Who would imagine that the Army Medical Corps would have the nursing done by such men if they could get better? It shows that the trained orderlies are far fewer than they should be; that every fit man had to be sent to the front, and that the only men they could fall back upon were the convalescents. That could be remedied by a little more expense. There was a remark made that that was due to the deficiency of transport; I make every allowance for that and for the exigencies of war, but I cannot help thinking that it would have been very easy to have spared one cattle-truck to bring in wounded men; but that does not excuse the case of convoys sent down without any medical officer in charge, or even a trained orderly. It does not excuse the management at the Cape. That appears to be the most significant of the charges of the hon. Gentleman, and it seems to indicate that this fault lies nearer home than South Africa. He told us of two base hospitals at the Cape, each of which had a capacity for 520 patients, and that they were overcrowded to such an extent that there were 2,400 patients in them. But that is not all, he told us that the whole of the personnel of one hospital had been sent to the front, and that the care of the whole of these 2,400 patients devolved on the hospital staff which was left—a hospital staff which was calculated to cope with 520. This is a case of overcrowding and improper treatment of the sick which might have been excusable if it had been impossible to send up nurses and hospitals, but in this case nothing could have been easier than to have sent out equipment and personnel to Cape Town at all events, and to prevent any such undesirable state of things at the hospitals at the base. There has been some discussion as to the merits of female nurses at the hospitals as against the orderly system, and I do not wish to enter into that, but when you have not got trained orderlies female nurses would be infinitely better than untrained soldiers and untrained convalescent soldiers. Typhoid is a disease in which mortality varies enormously; in some cases it is extremely high and in other cases it is exceedingly low. There was an epidemic at King's Lynn some time ago where it was so low that in one hospital amongst sixty patients there was not a single death. That was not attributable to extraordinary medical skill, but to the nature of the epidemic. It is impossible to compare one epidemic with another.

MR. WYNDHAM: It was compared by the ten years average.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON: Yes, but if you compared the King's Lynn epidemic by that average it would have shown a very good average. There is no disease in which diet is so important, and though it may be said that in the case of a soldier stricken down he cannot receive the same care and attention as he would receive at home, still, if there were less deaths than the ten years average shows, that was not due to better care, but to the mildness of the attack. The right hon. Gentleman must admit that patients treated as these men were must show a larger mortality than would have been the case had they been treated under more favourable circumstances. All that I wish to point out is that nothing that has been said about transport and military exigencies can explain away the condition described as existing at the base hospitals at the Cape. As to attributing these disclosures to any ill-feeling or lack of patriotism on the part of the hon. Member for Westminster, anyone has only to read his letter containing the description of the base hospitals, before he went up country, to find that it was of the most brilliant and glowing description. When hon. Gentlemen look at his letters they will agree that he described what he saw without fear or favour. I trust, without waiting for a formal inquiry, the War Office will ascertain whether this overcrowding exists at the Cape, and will at once take steps to remedy it.

MR. WYNDHAM: We have been in continual correspondence with South Africa for the last three months. These matters are governed by certain principles. Those principles are, however, expansible, and do expand, and we do send out more doctors as required. All we have been asked for we have sent.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON: That is just the kind of official defence with which I am but too well acquainted.

MR. WYNDHAM: Is it an official defence to ask Lord Roberts what he wants, and then to send on what he asks for?

SIR CHARLES CAMERON: Lord Roberts is not at the Cape; he has quite enough to do without attending to the medical details. Here is a case where the whole staff of a hospital has been sent to the front, and the care of two hospitals, overcrowded to an extent which must have taxed the energies of the staff to the utmost, has been devolved on the staff of one. Is it too much to ask not that Lord Roberts should be bothered with the matter, but that the right hon. Gentleman should do what was done in the case of India—telegraph to the person in charge, and see what he wanted.

MR. WYNDHAM: All that has been done. We are in correspondence with the senior medical officer at Cape Town, and also with General Forestier-Walker, and we have done all that is to be done.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON: I do not think that the hon. Gentleman intended to deceive, but I do not think he can have been in correspondence with the person actually in charge. However, in the interests of humanity, a statement of the kind that has been made ought to be inquired into, and if the hon. Gentleman does not inquire into this matter the country will not consider red tape a sufficient excuse for his not doing so.

*GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham) said the question which was now being discussed had been before the country for the past two days, and had caused a shock almost unexampled in this generation. He personally had seen a great many officers and men who had returned invalided to this country, and he possessed a great many friends now in South Africa with whom he was in correspondence, and few had greater opportunities of becoming acquainted with what went on behind the scenes than himself. He might say there was a general consensus of opinion that the hospital arrangements at the commencement of the war had been excellent. Then there had occurred an outbreak of typhoid fever under circumstances of exceptional difficulty. He spoke with great sympathy upon the matter, having had some experience of typhoid in a campaign, and no one could read the letter from the hon. Member which appeared in The Times, or listen to the statement he had made that evening, without a feeling of the greatest horror. The Committee ought to approach this subject, not in a party, but in a national spirit, and hence he was very glad that the motion which had given rise to the debate had been moved by a Member on the Government side of the House. At the time of the Atbara campaign he drew attention to what he considered were the most defective arrangements for succouring the wounded, but he was met with a denial of his statement, a denial based, no doubt, on insufficient information, because he met men who had been through that campaign, and he found his statements had been perfectly accurate, although they were officially denied. At the time of the Khartoum expedition a great change was made, a large number of additional doctors were sent out, all the appliances which science could devise were despatched, and hence at the attack of Khartoum everything was done to mitigate the suffering of the sick and wounded. He did not think a strong case had been made out on this occasion against the War Office. The hon. Gentleman had stated that more stores were sent out than were required, and he did not think that the War Office, or the hon. Gentleman who sat before him were the persons with whom fault should be found. He thought, however, there ought to be some explanation of how such a lamentable state of things came about, and at the same time he desired to point out to the Committee that the conditions of South Africa were such as to make an outbreak of typhoid fever almost a certainty. All the water for the troops had to be drawn from streams wherein people washed, and into which cattle wandered. At Paardeberg the river was filled with dead men and horses. He remembered perfectly well after the Zulu war, under the most favourable sanitary conditions, the bodies of troops moving about being very small, there were still a number of cases of typhoid caused entirely by bullocks suffering from the rinderpest going into the water to die, and men drinking the water. The water of the streams was so bad that when he was in charge of the military base hospital at Ladysmith he had scouting parties up the stream to see if any bullocks had died there, and, if so, to drag them out. Strict orders were also given that all water should be boiled, but upon a campaign of such rapid marches as that in South Africa at the present time, to boil all the water drunk was an impossibility; the men would have to drink what they could get, and typhoid was bound to appear. He failed to understand why, when there were a number of buildings in Bloemfontein unoccupied by the inhabitants, they were not used for the benefit of the wounded. Lord Roberts had been very justly called a humane general, but he (General Russell) ventured to say that had Germany or France been in that town there would be scarcely a house that would not have been cleared out, not only for the fever patients but also for the wounded. Under all the circumstances he could not believe that the facts as stated by the hon. Member for Westminster had been put before Lord Roberts. In his opinion, the Committee ought to know whether this matter was ever brought before the Commander-in Chief, or whether it only went before his Chief of the Staff, because everybody was fully aware that Lord Roberts had more to think about than hospital matters, his first care being to defeat his enemy. Many other duties must of necessity have been delegated to responsible staff officers. What ought to be done was to discover whether the representations were made by the principal medical officers, and if they went to Lord Roberts, or whether they only went before the Chief of the Staff and were disregarded by him. That was a matter which should be made perfectly plain. The question was a serious one; and another point which should be cleared up was how these hospitals at Capetown were allowed to fall into the condition described by the hon. Member for Westminster. He was sure that no one would be more anxious to prevent a recurrence of these evils than Lord Lansdowne, the Secretary of State for War. He thought that the hon. Member for Glasgow was right when he said that the Royal Army Medical Department was totally incapable of grappling with a great emergency like this, and we should have a reform and a reorganisation of that Department and all connected with it. He knew that the Government had had difficulties in regard to the Department, and that it was extremely hard to get good men. He thought a grievous mistake had been made in abolishing the regimental system, with the result that doctors in charge of regiments were changed almost from day to day. Hence necessarily medical officers could know nothing of the men whom they had to attend; and he earnestly hoped that the whole system would be so modified that a medical man would be attached to every regiment and battery. He could only repeat that hon. Members on his side of the House would welcome the proposed inquiry with the greatest pleasure, and he earnestly trusted that it would produce good results, so that our soldiers who went to fight our battles might have the best care and attention it was possible to give them.

MR. C. H. WILSON (Hull, W.) said he had listened with the greatest interest to the courageous statement made by the hon. Member for Westminster. He had had correspondence from South Africa, and especially one letter which seemed to bear on this subject from an entirely independent and unbiassed source. He had shown the letter to the hon. Member for Westminster, as it fully supported the statements that gentleman had made, statements in which he believed he had the entire sympathy of the country, and certainly the support of hon. Members on the Liberal side of the House; but so far as he could judge, he was afraid that Conservative Members had endeavoured to minimise and lessen the intense importance of those revelations. The country knew of the frightful loss of life which had taken place, and this was a matter which ought to be brought before the House. The letter to which he referred was from his son, who six months ago went out as a member of the City of London Imperial Volunteer Corps. The date of the letter, which was to the writer's sister, was 24th April, and in it were these words—

"All the English papers say that the hospitals are so wonderful, but as a matter of fact they are scandalously managed. Our own men will not go to hospital now, as they get less food and attention than with the regiment."

He simply wished to read that statement to the Committee, as it bore its own weight of evidence. The speeches from the Government side of the House had been somewhat sentimental and not matter of fact; but here was a simple statement bearing on this great question, and it was only fair to the hon. Member for Westminster, who had had the courage to bring up this subject, that he should, as far as he was able, give him his support in demanding an inquiry in regard to this crying evil. They all knew of the deficiencies of this campaign; they knew of the deficiencies in guns, and now they knew of the deficiencies in medical stores. Those who were familiar with the history of the Crimean War knew that history always repeated itself, and still at the War Office there was the same want of prevision which had resulted in this enormous loss of life among the best men of the country. Who were responsible for this? In his opinion, it was the War Office.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) said the interesting point at which they had now arrived in this discussion prompted him to ask how those gentlemen opposite were going to vote. Were they going to vote for this grant of £5 to the Government, or were they not? That would be the test of their sincerity. Every kind of attack had been made against the Government. He was not given to the defence of the Government; but on this occasion it seemed to him that the Government had made a most complete answer to these attacks. The Government had been accused of every kind of official neglect: that there were not enough nurses or doctors or medical stores, and perhaps the hon. Member who had just spoken would say, not enough ships. Did hon. Members remember that war was a very terrible business, that it entailed necessarily an enormous amount of suffering, more especially when the lines of communication, as in this case, were extremely long, and that all supplies and men had to be carried over a single line of railway? It should be remembered that the distance from Cape Town to Pretoria was 1,000 miles—as far as from here to Gibraltar. He was astonished to hear the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean, whose knowledge of these things was very complete and very accurate, and who gave his knowledge to the House in a continuous stream of a most interesting character—[HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!]—interesting to him, at any rate, if not to the hon. Baronet's friends—he was surprised to hear the hon. Baronet adduce the German campaign against France as having some kind of parallelism with this South African war. He talked of the number of wounded after the battle of Gravelotte, and Mars-la-Tours, and said that the Germans were perfectly capable of dealing with them. But the Germans were in the middle of a network of railways thoroughly equipped with rolling stock. The difference was enormous. Let the Committee remember that the whole of this question was a question of transport. If it had not been for the length of the lines of transport these difficulties would never have arisen. It was true that something had been said about the hospital at Cape Town, where the difficulties were not the same as up country; but he thought that that was the weakest part of the case made out by the hon. Member for Westminster. He found some defects in the hospital at Cape Town, but these defects were in consequence of the removal of some of the staff in order to cure the defects further up the line. The hon. Member said that there were not enough orderlies, but that was because they had been removed from Cape Town to Bloemfontein, and they were being replaced from day to day by constant arrivals from England. With regard to the camp at Maitland, he really thought the hon. Member had made out no case at all. It was a camp of convalescents, and in the instance the hon. Member gave the sergeant in charge apparently did not recognise that a man with a high pulse and a high temperature had fever, and did not get the man removed. He did not think that it followed that because a man had a high temperature it was at all necessary to remove him. He would rather take the opinion of the hon. Member for Ilkeston than that of the hon. Member for Westminster; in fact he should as soon have that of the sergeant.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: What I did was to secure the attendance of a doctor to see this man. The arrangements of the convalescent huts provided for the patients being left in the hands of an untrained sergeant.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Quite so; but if he were in a convalescent camp, and the hon. Member came to him and said, "Your temperature is high, and I will send for a doctor," he might reply, "That might be another danger to what I am already in." This debate had been long but useful. His belief was that in no previous campaign of which there was any record had there been so little unnecessary loss of life, either from wounds or sickness, as in this. That was his deliberate belief, and he was an entirely independent person, and had endeavoured to inform himself of all the facts of the case. Of course he understood that other people might arrive at a contrary impression. What he wished to point out was that the hon. Member for Westminster went out to South Africa not as a commissioner, or even as a Member of this House, because he was acting against the rules of the House when he went out there without permission. He went out, he was sure, for the very best of motives and intentions, and he was certain that the hon. Member's efforts and all that he said to-night would result in good. But the chief result would be the bringing home the conviction that in this war, at any rate, the War Office had done about as well as they could, and the medical staff as well as could be expected. The hon. Member having gone to the seat of war not in a scientific or official capacity, but as a war correspondent, it was his duty to find out remarkable cases and bring them before the public in his paper. He said to himself, "If I can find any evil case in connection with the Medical Department it will be my duty to paint it in the strongest colours and bring it before the British public." [HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] He thought if hon. Members consulted the editor of a newspaper they would find that that was the view the editor would take. Well, the hon. Member had told them that in his opinion the fault was not so much here as in South Africa. If that were so, what was the case against the Government? But if it was in South Africa, with whom was the fault? Was it with Lord Roberts? Scarcely, he thought. Was it with the Royal Army Medical Department? There again, if the Government sent out a sufficient number of orderlies, nurses, and doctors, surely they should not be held responsible for failure. Therefore he thought that the argument against the Government had most completely failed. It must be remembered that a general in the field had first of all to look to the safety of his army, including the sick and wounded; for unless he provided a sufficient supply of food and ammunition the whole army, including the sick and wounded, would otherwise be exposed to destruction. Undoubtedly, however sad and melancholy it might be to make the revelation, the claims of the wounded and the sick must come next to that vital necessity. The hon. Member said that there might be a reasonable inroad on military exigencies. Who was to be the judge of that reasonable inroad? Who but the general in the field? He alone could tell the necessities of the Army. Nobody else could say what road he had to take, what dangers he would have to encounter, what the enemy he would have to meet; and no person who went out from this country without a knowledge of all strategic necessities could tell what was a reasonable inroad on military exigencies. If they did not leave that to the general, they might just as well take the whole army from him. The hon. Member for Westminster complained insistently of the delay at Bloemfontein. Who was to be the judge of that? The hon. Member himself? Nobody but the Commander-in-Chief. [HON. MEMBERS: No, no!] Yes, that was part of the case. There was too much delay; military exigencies were too much considered. The point of the case was that there was not a sufficient number of orderlies. That was a question of transport. There was an inadequate supply of medical comforts and appliances. That also was a question of transport. It might perfectly well be that in a long train of wagons room might have been found for another wagon with these medical comforts and appliances. But who was to decide that? Surely the general in the field. They were not going to judge here in Whitehall or Pall Mall as to whether another wagon could be added to a long train. It would be absolutely impossible. That was a matter that must be left absolutely to the discretion of the general, and that general was the man to whom they must look with the utmost confidence. Now, in regard to Lord Roberts, it was not without pain that that distinguished soldier would hear of the debate that night. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] Yes, because he would feel that it was he who had been attacked. [HON. MEMBERS: No, no!] Lord Roberts would be as well aware as he was that the discretion of taking or leaving more ammunition, or more doctors, more food for the Army, or more orderlies rested with him, and with him alone, and he would feel that in the arrangements as between military necessities and medical necessities he was alone responsible. If there was one general in the British Army who was more keenly anxious that the sick and the wounded should be cared for it was, without doubt, that distinguished soldier; and he thought it would not be without pain that he would read some of the speeches made that night. [Ironical cries of "Hear, hear."] Another order of suggestion had been made by the hon. Member for Ilkeston. On the one hand the Royal Army Medical Department was denounced as incapable. He did not think they were incapable; neither was that the charge made by the hon. Member for Westminster, who said that there were not enough members of that corps to fill the proper places for them. That was not a charge of incapacity. The hon. Member for Ilkeston had offered to go out as a commissioner at the beginning of the war—a most patriotic offer—but he did not know whether, if he had gone out, he would have met the circumstances of the case. Did the hon. Member suppose that if he had gone out to South Africa at the beginning of October the difficulties of transport would have been less, that Lord Roberts would have taken a different view of the relative necessities of the military and medical exigencies? The hon. Member suggested that there had been too much cheeseparing in regard to the Royal Army Medical Department, but it seemed to him that if there was one Department more than another which had been absolutely spoiled it was the Royal Army Medical Department. They had received increased pay, increased allowances, and glorified titles. The view which the hon. Member for Ilkeston took of a camp was that it should consist of a medical officer with a few gentlemen to provide interesting cases. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] He was putting it in a strong way in order to let hon. Gentlemen opposite understand what he meant.

His belief was, first of all that there never was a campaign, considering all the conditions, considering the length and imperfect nature of the lines of communication, and considering the rapid advance and the changes of plans, in which the wounded and sick were so well looked after. Moreover, he would add that, considering the enormous interests at stake, considering the activity, the numbers, and bravery of the enemy, although one could not but be sorry for those who had lost their lives, the wonder was not that the number of those who had lost their lives by bullet and disease had been so large, but that it had been so small—a smaller number, in fact, than we had lost in a single battle in campaigns of far less importance. This debate had shown to him, as an outside and impartial observer, that Her Majesty's Government had been scarcely impugned; certainly no case had been made out against them. The case suggested against the authorities at the Cape was of the slightest, and the other and larger case suggested against Lord Roberts, that he had attached too much importance to the military exigencies compared with the medical, had broken down. Her Majesty's Government were to be congratulated upon having given the hon. Member the opportunity of bringing this question forward.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon): Hon. Members on this side of the House have been accused of treating this question with levity. This is a matter in which there has been considerable human suffering, and in which there has been the loss of very valuable lives, and when so skilled a debater as the hon. Member for King's Lynn is reduced to such an expedient in order to defend this case, then I think we may come to a fair conclusion as to what the character of that case must be. The hon. Member for King's Lynn has said, and said truly, that Lord Roberts has been attacked; but I should like to ask by whom Lord Roberts has been attacked? The charges brought by the hon. Member for Westminster have not even been challenged. The speech of the Under Secretary for War was simply by way of confession and avoidance. No one who knows anything about the circumstances has got up and challenged the accuracy of a single statement made by the hon. Member for Westminster. The hon. and gallant Member for Central Sheffield, who delivered a very remarkable speech a few minutes ago, and whose experience and military position give his opinions considerable weight in everything he says in matters of this character, practically added the weight of his experience to the indictment which was drawn up by the hon. Member for Westminster. What is the defence of the Under Secretary of State for War? It amounts to this—that everything that was asked for by Lord Roberts was given him. What does that mean? It means that the responsibility does not rest with the Government. The facts are admitted. The Government admit this terrible array of facts, and, therefore, the inference we are called upon to draw is that the Government have cast the responsibility for what has happened upon Lord Roberts and Lord Kitchener. The hon. Member for King's Lynn is perfectly right, for there has been an attack upon Lord Roberts — and a very mean attack — but the attack has not come from Members on this side of the House, but from those who ought to defend Lord Roberts. These facts have been corroborated by perfectly independent testimony. I see in papers which have hitherto supported the policy of the war throughout — in fact, who have done their very best to promote this war—letters from war correspondents not merely corroborating the case of the hon. Member for Westminster, but making even more serious charges. Take what has appeared to-day in what I will call a very well-known jingo paper from one of its correspondents at the front—and it is rather significant that this correspondent never made these charges until he came home. When he was at the front and had to get his messages passed by the censor he confined himself to attacks upon the Boers, but when he comes home what does he say? He says that all the time he was at Bloemfontein he was haunted by the horror of the neglect and cruelty to the sick. He writes a good deal more of the same category. The correspondent I allude to is Mr. Julian Ralph, and yet we are told that the responsibility does not rest upon Her Majesty's Government, who have sent an abundance and even a superfluity of stores to Cape Colony. What does this correspondent say with regard to Natal? He says that he heard there of a case where a private citizen supplied bandages to one of the hospitals in Cape Town.

MR. WYNDHAM: How can the hon. Member reconcile that statement with the fact stated in the telegram I have read to the Committee asking us to stop sending surgical material?

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I can only reconcile it by saying that it is a Daily Mail statement. Besides, I do not think that that is a sufficient answer, because the whole case of the hon. Member for Westminster is that even if those appliances were at Cape Town they did not get to the sick and the wounded, either through the red tape or insufficient staff. The hon. Member has not challenged the accuracy of the statements. I do not suggest that what the Under Secretary for War has stated is not a fact; but if is true it rather strengthens the case of the hon. Member for Westminster that, although there was such a quantity of bandages there, they were not supplied to the sick and wounded in the hospitals. There is another case which comes from Birmingham, and I need hardly state that, therefore, on the face of it, it bears the stamp of truth. It is the case of a Birmingham soldier who was invalided home, and he says that he frequently saw naked men in a delirious state wandering about on cold nights, and that he himself had to wait seven or eight hours before he could get a drink of water, and that although he was in the hospital twenty-one days he never saw a nurse. I do not quote from papers which are in the habit of adversely criticising Her Majesty's Government, because statements of that kind must be open to suspicion. Here is a statement made in another paper which supports the war. It asserts that an officer under Lord Methuen had stated that our soldiers were absolutely tortured to death by unnecessary jolting. These are rather significant statements following the attacks which have been made upon the Boers, and the inhumanity and the barbarity of the Boer ambulances, which have proved to be so superior to our own that many of our wounded have preferred to be captured by the Boers rather than endure the terrible vista of suffering which they saw before them in the British ambulance. That statement was made on the authority of the Daily Express. After all, these statements are not challenged by Lord Roberts. I have read his letters very carefully, and the facts are practically admitted by the Under Secretary for War, and by Lord Roberts as well. There is the case of the Welsh hospital. When it reached Capetown it could not get to the front for days for lack of transport. The most crying necessity existed for it at the front, but they could not get it there. At last this hospital was sent off in charge of someone at Cape Town, who did not know how to put up the hospital, and the major in charge had to do the work himself, because the men supplied at Cape Town did not know how to fix up the tents. The result there has been deplorable. Professor Jones, who volunteered to go to the front, who is one of the finest men Wales has produced, is dead, and one or two other members of his staff died, very largely through the defective arrangements. These are the complaints which have come home from that quarter. These are the kind of complaints that have come from all directions, and I think they deserve something more than the consideration which they have received to-night from several hon. Members on the other side. I venture to say that the one great lesson of the whole of this business is that it has brought home to the people of this country the inevitable horrors of war. There is nothing which struck me more in the eloquent speech of the Under Secretary for War than what he said in his opening statement to the effect that all this human suffering was inevitable. If it was inevitable, I wonder whether the Colonial Secretary knew it during his negotiations with the Transvaal? I cannot believe that any man with all this vista of suffering in front of him would have proceeded with the recklessness which the right hon. Gentleman has shown. All this suffering has taken place for the one-tenth which was "not worth fighting for." There is a statement in the papers to-day by Dr. Treves, which shows that the whole business has been one series of horrible miscalculations. He says that at the battle of Colenso instead of sixty or seventy wounded they actually had 800. This is an illustration of th miscalculation which has dogged the footsteps of this war from the very outset. How is it that there is an insufficiency of medical appliances? We now have plenty of bandages, doctors, and nurses, although we did not have them at the critical moment. And why? Because the Government sent out an army of 50,000 men to accomplish a task which they now admit 220,000 is not more than sufficient for. Knowing the facts, knowing the number of guns and the number of the enemy, still they make this horrible miscalculation at the beginning. If 50,000 or 60,000 men were sufficient, of course the medical appliances would be in proportion to the number of men. But when it was discovered that the force originally sent out was utterly inadequate the whole of their arrangements absolutely broke down, transport and all. [Cries of "No, no!"] It is said the facts prove that it is all a question of transport. But, after all, transport is a question of arrangement weeks and months beforehand. Similar statements to this made in the course of this debate have been received with laughter, but let me point out that in an answer given by the Under Secretary of State for War, he stated this was a matter of weeks. Lord Roberts complained of the insufficiency of locomotives and rolling-stock. Of course you cannot get locomotives and rolling-stock in three weeks.

MR. WYNDHAM: It is a matter of nine months.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: My case is that if there was an insufficiency of transport it is not a question of weeks but of months, and according to the Under Secretary it is a question of nine months.

MR. WYNDHAM: They had to be constructed on the broad gauge.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I know that rolling stock of any other gauge would be perfectly useless. The whole business is one of miscalculation. The diplomacy was miscalculated, the arrangements for the war were miscalculated, and you miscalculated the resisting powers of the Boers or whether they would resist at all. There has been a complete want of knowledge of local circumstances. There is one thing which strikes me as very remarkable in the speech of the hon. Member for Westminster. He asked, when it was a question of saving so many human lives, what difference would a day make in the date of the advance? That question was received with hilarious and contemptuous laughter by the Leader of the House and the Under Secretary for War and by another great military authority. I must say that I fail to see why they laughed at such a question. There was evidently a great hurry to get to Pretoria. It was to be captured by a certain date, on which the war was to be declared at an end. Of course, I will not say that it had anything to do with the General Election. I should not have made that suggestion except for the fact that no one doubts in this House that the lives of the troops have been sacrificed in Natal and in other places to political exigencies. [Cries of "Oh, oh!"] I repeat that the lives of our troops have been sacrificed to political exigencies. [An HON. MEMBER: Horrible!] But anyone who reads the despatches must come to that conclusion. There were sacrifices of this description at the Modder River in the great hurry that was shown to relieve Kimberley. It was recklessness with regard to human suffering and the loss of human life which led to the war, and that is at the bottom of all this series of disasters which have so impressed the country, and for exposing which the country owes a deep debt of gratitude to the hon. Member for Westminster.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am not, I think, in the habit of using strong language in this House, but I deliberately say that in all my experience of our debates in this House I have never heard a more discreditable speech——

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I rise to order. I wish to know whether it is Parliamentary for the right hon. Gentleman to say that an hon. Member has made a discreditable speech.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I do not see anything unparliamentary in the expression, which I have heard frequently used on both sides of the House.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I do not object at all, Mr. Lowther.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the interruption of the hon. Baronet was wholly unnecessary. I repeat that in all my political experience I have never heard a more discreditable speech than the one which has fallen from the hon. Member for Carnarvon. He was not content with deliberately suggesting that the Secretary for the Colonies had, for his own purposes and with an utter disregard for the sufferings of other people, rushed the country into this war; but he went on to say that the lives of our soldiers in Natal, in the Orange Free State, and in the Transvaal had been deliberately sacrificed for political objects——

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Hear, hear!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Meaning by that, obviously, that the generals in the field—spurred on, we must assume, by directions from home—had engaged in military operations not otherwise justifiable, not in themselves humane, but prompted solely by political exigencies——

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Hear, hear!

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not sully my lips by saying that that is wholly untrue. I do not stoop to defend either my colleagues or myself from insinuations of that kind; but I say for a Member of this House to accuse our generals of being the tools of party, of being men prepared to see their soldiers unnecessarily butchered before their eyes, or subjected to untold tortures to please a body of politicians at home—for that is what the hon. Member said—I say that to adequately characterise such a statement as that the word "discreditable" is utterly inadequate; and if I could use a stronger expression which would be consistent with our Parliamentary manners I should undoubtedly make use of it.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: I never made any charge——[Cries of "Oh!"] Will you kindly wait until I finish what I am about to say? I never made any charge against our generals. The charge I brought was against politicians, and I adhere to it. But the allegation of my having made a charge against the generals in the field is absolutely untrue. Whatever orders the generals in the field got they were perfectly justified in carrying out. It is a lie.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will not express my opinion at greater length in regard to the speech of the hon. Member, and I turn to other Members who carried on this controversy with little actual fairness to the Government, but certainly with no desire, I believe, to misrepresent the Government or the actions of our officers in the field. I regret the nature of some of the attacks which fell from my hon. friend the Member for Westminster—attacks not dwelt upon at any length, but which, I think, were insinuations or suggestions that might with advantage have been left alone. There were two which specially remain in my mind. One was against the newspaper correspondents in the field, because he distinctly implied that these gentlemen, on whom we so largely rely for our information, doctored that information for the purposes of their own newspaper, or in order to maintain favour with the authorities at the front.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: As far as I can remember, I most distinctly deny that I ever charged the correspondents with doctoring their information for any purpose.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hon. friend did say that we could not absolutely trust the statements of the correspondents in the field, because they had a strong motive for making their reports agreeable.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I made a very long speech, but I believe that I am in the recollection of the Committee when I repeat that what I said was that a correspondent could not cable owing to the censor, and that if he wrote home he was open to the danger of whatever he wrote being cabled back within two and a half weeks, and that then I did not envy the position in which he was placed.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It may be my own denseness, but I certainly interpret the statement which my hon. friend has just repeated as carrying with it the suggestion that a correspondent would not write letters of that kind because he should have a very unenviable lot if he did write them. That is all I suggest. [AN HON. MEMBER: You said "doctored."]

MR. BRYN ROBERTS: There is a difference between silence and misrepresentation.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have many other important matters to deal with. There is only one other observation of my hon. friend of an incidental character to which I will call attention, and that is his suggestion that the tradition which he represents as having been in force some time ago among soldiers to be afraid of the hospital authorities was one which still had some force. I am sorry my hon. friend made that suggestion. I believe it to be wholly unfounded. All the information which has reached me, from whatever source, shows that the soldiers, whether there has been a sufficient amount of medical attention or not, at all events have appreciated, from the beginning to the end of those unhappy military operations, the unvarying kindness of the doctors and other attendants, and I am sorry that my hon. friend should have made a suggestion which must cause the greatest pain to those who have devoted themselves to the sick and wounded. I now pass to the main substance of the attacks which have been made to-night. Those attacks may be divided into the attacks on Her Majesty's Government and the attacks on Lord Roberts. The attacks on Her Majesty's Government are evidently what really animates hon. Gentlemen opposite. They want to extract from this episode, and from my hon. friend's letter, material for a party fight. I make no such suggestion against the only hon. Gentleman who has spoken from the Front Bench opposite; but those who have heard the speech we have just listened to, and other speeches which have preceded it, will not for a moment suggest that my statement is overcoloured. Unfortunately, it is impossible in this debate, with the best will in the world, to strike an effective blow at Her Majesty's Government without striking that blow through Lord Roberts, and that is the real perplexity in which debaters of the class of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Carnarvon have found themselves from beginning to end in this matter. My hon. friend whose letter to The Times started this debate has himself reiterated over and over again that, so far as his observation and his knowledge of the facts are concerned, he does not believe that any deficiency is to be traced to an insufficient supply of medical stores at headquarters. With the supply of an adequate number of men and an adequate amount of medical stores in South Africa it is evident that the direct responsibility of Her Majesty's Government ends, and must end, and afterwards that it rests with the military authorities on the spot to use those stores and those men to the best advantage. And if the amount of medical stores and the men be sufficient, the only question we have got to ask is whether those men and those stores have, after they arrived in South Africa, been used to the best purpose by the authorities on the spot. I do not believe that it has been seriously asserted by anybody that an insufficient amount of medical stores has been sent. Directly we come face to face and close with the facts, it all turns on the question of transport, and that was admitted by—in fact, it was part of the argument of—my hon. friend the Member for Westminster. It is, and must be, admitted by anyone who has heard the facts that we are really ultimately driven to consider whether or not the military authorities—Lord Roberts and his subordinates—were well advised in using the limited means of transport in the way that, as a matter of fact, they actually did. That really is the question, and therefore you are, and must be, attacking the military authorities on the spot and not the Government at home when you deal with the deficiencies, or the alleged deficiencies, which have occurred at Bloemfontein and elsewhere. And that is why I say that, with obviously most earnest desire to wound her Majesty's Government, it is the general in the field who really has been struck at. Let me now, parenthetically, allude to the one constructive suggestion I have heard in the course of this debate. Most of it, as I have said, has been criticism, some of it party criticism, but there was a suggestion made by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Ilkeston Division which I think is the only contribution of a constructive character to the problem with which we have to deal. The hon. Gentleman suggests that there ought to have been a kind of roving committee of independent medical men who should, in his own phrase, stand between the military medical authorities and the generals in the field. I do not think I misrepresent his views. Was ever such a proposal made for rendering impotent an army in the field? As I understand the hon. Gentleman, Lord Roberts is to say to this roving consultative medical committee, "I mean to make a rapid march through the country, covering such and such a distance, and I shall be able to take with me only such and such an amount of medical stores." And thereupon the medical committee will say, "If you do that a great many of the soldiers will remain without adequate medical comforts and with an insufficient number of medical attendants, and, in the name of humanity, we must ask you to march a little slower." I really cannot imagine anything which would at once more effectually dislocate both our military arrangements and our medical arrangements, and, whatever shortcomings there may be in the present system, the hon. Gentleman will allow me to say, with all respect, that that system is much better than the one he recommended. Before leaving the hon. Gentleman, may I make one other observation on a matter on which he speaks with far greater authority to the Committee than I can pretend to. He has discussed, with all the knowledge of a great doctor, the amount of mortality which ought to attend this outbreak of typhoid — a mortality, let me remind the Committee, of 21 per cent. of the cases, and admittedly lower than the mortality in such cases in any war in which we have ever been engaged, and lower, I believe, than in any war in which any other Power has ever been engaged. [An HON. MEMBER: No!] Yes, I believe so; and comparing favourably not only with the mortality among soldiers in time of war, but with that among soldiers at home in time of peace, with the use of every possible medical appliance. Then the hon. Gentleman comes and stakes his medical reputation on the statement that if there had been proper medical attention and appliances the mortality might have been reduced from 21 to 12 per cent. I am glad to think the hon. Gentleman's medical reputation is far too solidly based to be upset even by such a wild hypothesis, otherwise I should really be tempted to say he was indulging in the most extravagant imaginary statistics. Remember, the soldier in the field is at the time of life when a man is most susceptible to typhoid. The ordinary statistics in populations in civil life give 15, 16, or 17 per cent., including infants, who do not usually succumb to the disease, and, of course, the percentage presents a much more favourable result than when it is applied to men in the prime of life at the most susceptible age. If we at home with our hospitals and appliances cannot reduce the mortality among soldiers below 21 per cent., is it not straining our faith in the hon. Gentleman's ability to ask us to believe that the percentage could be reduced to 12 among soldiers on service? I cannot really believe that the hon. Gentleman will, on reflection, adhere to his conjecture. I have said this is really an attack upon Lord Roberts and his staff, and that statement met with expressions of disfavour from the other side. But the right hon. Baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean said deliberately, if I do not misinterpret him, that the military authorities should have managed their transport so as to bring up more medical supplies.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I do not deny that. I stated that I agreed with what had been said on that point by the hon. Member for Westminster, that under the circumstances of the case what had been done by the Germans at the moment of greatest pressure before Metz was equally open to Lord Roberts.

MR. BALFOUR: The right hon. Baronet not only says it on his own great authority, but also on that of the hon. Member for Westminster. That, then, is an attack on Lord Roberts and his staff, and nothing else. The whole question is one of transport, avowedly one of transport. If there could have been tents, doctors, nurses, medical supplies brought up to Bloemfontein with the desired speed, these things would not have occurred, and they occurred because the transport was not supplied. The hon. Member for Ilkeston says an outbreak of typhoid should have been foreseen and provided for. Well, it was foreseen, but how could it be provided for? How could we provide for an outbreak of typhoid when we could scarcely get to Bloemfontein the necessary supplies for the Army? I should almost be ashamed to labour the point after the brilliant speech of the Under Secretary for War, but it has been systematically disregarded all through. Has the Committee the least notion of how narrow was the margin of supplies on which Lord Roberts made his phenomenal and historical march? Recollect, the success of the war, the rapid and effectual success of the war, turned upon the extreme rapidity of Lord Roberts's movements. So rapid was his advance that on one occasion we know as a fact from Lord Roberts that for a few hours he was in serious anxiety about the supplies of food and ammunition requisite for the existence of his army. The actual occasion was, I think, upon his getting into Johannesburg; but all through his march he was working on the very narrowest margin; men were sleeping in the open air night after night because tents had not come up, and the supply of provisions was the smallest compatible with safety. It was therefore impossible, fighting and marching at the rate he did, that he could have all the comforts and conveniences of a London hospital, or even the comforts of a hospital at the base; and, therefore, preparation at Bloemfontein was impossible. It could not be done. You may say what you like about the outbreak of fever, no amount of prevision would have prevented what happened in consequence of the difficulties of transport, and the difficulties of transport alone. I want to know whether the House thinks that anything is seriously gained by criticising in this way the decisions of generals in the field? My hon. friend the Member for Westminster brought forward many cases which came under his own personal observation of hardships, deplorable and lamentable, to the wounded at Bloemfontein and afterwards at Kroonstad. On the details of these statements I should not cast the least doubt, but I think we should hear what the doctors have to say on the other side. My hon. friend had a harrowing story of eight wounded men left on the platform nine hours at Bloemfontein. It is a horrible thing to contemplate. It makes one's blood run cold. But before we condemn the doctors—and I suppose they were the responsible persons for that at Bloemfontein—I think we ought to hear their case, and the more so as it is manifestly difficult to get at the truth in these matters. My hon. friend said the hospital at Cape Town was built opposite the mouth of an open sewer. I am told that that is a statement in which my hon. friend is mistaken. At all events it has been contradicted on high authority.

Mr. Balfour.

It is evident with regard to this particular case of the eight men left on the platform at Bloemfontein that we must have, and ought to have, the justification, if justification there be, of the local authorities; we ought to hear what the other side has to say before we pass an indiscriminate opinion. It is quite clear that the House is not capable with the information now before it of dealing with the details of the situation. I pass to the broad issue I wish to lay before the House, which is whether we should condemn the general in the field. [Cries of "No, no!"] What is the use of saying "No, no" when the hon. Baronet admits that I have not misrepresented him? When it is admitted, it may please hon. Gentlemen to allow me to make my statement without these interruptions. The broad issue is whether we should condemn the general in the field—[Cries of "No, no!"]—for making his military arrangements so that necessarily for a short period there was an insufficient supply of medical comforts, whether we are to insist that he shall limit the sphere of his operations, check the rapidity of his movements, dull the strength of his blow in order that there shall be not a moment's delay in tending the wounded. Sir, that is not war or humanity, nor the way to be successful in military operations, nor the way to save human life. If there is one truth more surely learnt than another in military history it is to bring war to a rapid conclusion and limit the inevitable human suffering by striking rapidly and hard, even though the immediate result may be momentary loss of human life. For my part I cannot imagine a worse lesson to teach the generals of this country than that whenever, by the exceeding rapidity of their operations, these sufferings are caused they are to be the subject of comment in Parliament and used as the counters of politicians like the hon. Member for the Carnarvon Boroughs, and that their credit and honour is to be made the plaything of contending parties. I hope the House will never lend itself willingly to this procedure. Let hon. Members attack the Government as much as they like. We are accustomed to it; it is our trade to listen to these comments, and we do so with the utmost philosophy. But do not let the House lend itself to attacks which, under the guise of attacks on the Government, are attacks on generals in the field, and by attacking generals in the field sap the very foundations of our military strength.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): In the few words, Mr. Lowther, which I shall address to the Committee, I hope I shall be able to maintain a somewhat calmer temper than has been exhibited throughout the course of the somewhat long harangue——

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Not "long."

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: The speeches of the right hon. Gentleman never seem long, but this one did seem longer than usual in consequence of the high tone that was maintained. The right hon. Gentleman began his speech by rebuking my hon. friend the Member for Carnarvon for having made a "discreditable" speech. Without applying such an epithet as that applied to the speech of my hon. friend, I think the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman at least commenced his observations was not worthy of him or the House or the occasion which has created the debate. The right hon. Gentleman said that it is an attack on Her Majesty's Government which really animates us, and I am not at all surprised to find that that sentiment was largely endorsed by the Secretary for the Colonies, for he gives us no credit whatever for any sympathy with suffering, no credit for a desire for an inquiry into what amount of faulty proceedings there may be in relation to the treatment of the sick and wounded in South Africa. According to the right hon. Gentleman we do not share at all the anxiety, the thrilling feelings which the people of this country have experienced by the revelations made by the hon. Member for Westminster. We have no feelings, apparently, of that kind; our one squalid idea is to attack, rightly or wrongly, Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman thinks that in a debate of this nature, originated in the manner to which I shall allude presently, it is worthy of his position as Leader of the House to make such an imputation. I have said I would refer to the circumstances in which this debate has arisen. How has it arisen? The hon. Member for Westminster published the letter in The Times to which such frequent reference has been made. That letter so deeply moved public opinion that a number of us felt obliged to ask simple questions in order to ascertain what the view of the Government was with regard to it, and the right hon. Gentleman then got up, and what did he say? He did not blame the hon. Member who had written this letter. He did not blame us for asking questions on the subject, but he said that "the matter is so serious that the state of things disclosed so rightly calls for inquiry that we ourselves will institute an inquiry. We will send out a commission." [MR. BALFOUR: No.] Did he not say so? Then what was the meaning of the indignation with regard to my hon. friend the Member for Ilkestone when he asked whether an inquiry would be made? The reply of the right hon. Gentleman was, "I said so yesterday." The right hon. Gentleman laid so much stress on this inquiry yesterday, he so recognised the natural desire of the House of Commons to discuss this serious matter, these great revelations, that he said, "We will go out of our way and invent a new method by bringing in a Supplementary Vote of £5 in order that the House may discuss the subject." Now he thinks that we forget all this, and says that it is we, with the world behind, who have invented this occasion to get up this attack, this rigged-up attack, on the Government. No, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman will find, I think, when he cools down a little that we have a perfect right to discuss this matter without having such imputations made upon us.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I made no imputation.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I call it an imputation. In a matter of this great gravity, of this solemn character, involving as it does the lives and deaths and sufferings, or escape from suffering, of thousands of our brave fellow-countrymen, the right hon. Gentleman will find that we are merely taking an opportunity which he gave us, and that we are not really animated by the sole desire to have a good party attack on the Government. The hon. Member whose writings in The Times originated the whole of this discussion must, I think, be on the whole thoroughly satisfied with the proceedings of to-night. I am merely repeating what has been said before when I say that not one of his allegations, as I understand it, not one of the facts he has stated, has been disputed, certainly not controverted, on the part of Her Majesty's Government. And, therefore, the hon. Member stands in this position, that he has disclosed to the country a part, at all events, of the truth of this great matter, and he has done it in such a way that he can receive nothing but thanks from the community for doing it. Now, Sir, I have heard no reference made to-night to two curious passages in the paper that was circulated this morning. We have heard all along of the hon. Member for Westminster and of his papers in The Times. But in the War Office telegram to Lord Roberts the War Office say, "We are receiving private telegrams complaining of alleged general breakdown in hospitals," and then they go on to say, "A complaint of your hospitals at the front has just come in." That one complaint which has just come in was obviously a telegram from the hon. Member. But what are the other private telegrams complaining of a general breakdown? We have not heard any explanation of those. That telegram was sent on 5th June. A good many days, and even weeks, elapsed, and on 20th June the War Office, who profess to have no knowledge of these mistakes and defects pointed out by the hon. Member, write, "We continue to receive disquieting reports as to the state of hospitals." We have heard nothing of what those disquieting reports, rumours, and complaints are. But, at all events, they show that Her Majesty's Government are not indebted only to the hon. Member for their information upon the subject. But the country at large is. The hon. Member's information came like a thunder-clap upon the country, because up to that time we had all been saying that, although many departments of the Army administration had surprised the country by their efficiency during this war, there was one which had excelled all others—namely, the medical department, and the country was under the belief that in regard to medical matters everything was at its best in the best of all possible departments in South Africa. The disclosure came as a great blow upon the country. Now, Sir, I cannot altogether divorce the surprise with which these revelations were received from the very uneasy feeling which has pervaded a large portion, at any rate, of the community, inducing us to doubt whether we were receiving really full and true information, not only in regard to hospitals, but in regard to other matters in South Africa. This is the first time, so far as I am aware, that this country has engaged in a war on anything like this scale under the influence of what is called a censorship. To a censorship applied to purely military questions, to a censorship which restricts news which may be of a character capable of giving undesirable information to the enemy, we all willingly bow and submit. But when we find, as we do, that military censorship applied to political matters, to private letters, to private telegrams, how can we fail to have some doubt—I will go no further than that—whether, after all, with all the newspapers and teeming intelligence around us, we understand really the full facts of the case? Now, Sir, the hon. Member's allegations have not been disputed nor disposed of, as I have said, but merely explanations and excuses have been made for them. This debate must necessarily be incomplete and unsatisfactory, because we are not in possession of the facts which would enable us as individuals to judge of what has happened. We do know certain bald facts. We know, for instance, that for every one man who has died of his wounds in South Africa, two men have died of enteric fever. Roughly, I think, that is about the proportion. The question we have to consider is, generally, was this danger of great sickness and enteric fever realised and provided for by the Government and by their advisers? My hon. friend the Member for Ilkeston has related to us the part he took. He suggested that when you were sending out eminent surgeons to see that the surgical treatment of the wounded was properly conducted, you ought not to have neglected the weightier matter of sending out eminent physicians to advise as to matters affecting the sick. The right hon. Gentleman made game of my hon. friend's proposal. He talked of it as a roving commission which was to dictate to the generals what they were to do. Why did he send out surgeons? What is a patriotic act in a surgeon cannot be quite a crime in a physician. With regard to the general question, we have evidence on all hands that the probability of a great prevalence of this particular disorder was known to every one acquainted with the circumstances of South Africa. The right hon. baronet the Member for the Forest of Dean quoted from the Army Medical Report an account given last year of the liability of Ladysmith and that quarter to this particular disease. We want to know whether that danger was fully realised. The Under Secretary says that it was. Then was it fully provided for? We do not know, and we cannot know until this inquiry takes place. The second question is this—whether, during those weeks of waiting at Bloemfontein everything was done that could be done. The first epidemic was incubated elsewhere; but there has been a second outbreak since. Was not each of these attacks capable of being guarded against, or the results modified, by certain steps which might have been taken? The Under Secretary says that Lord Roberts's first duty was to feed the large army under him, and that then he had to accumulate stores as well as he could to keep them during their rapid advance. I suppose that the supply of nurses and orderlies would come afterwards. Some of us are not sure that they should have come afterwards.

MR. WYNDHAM: I did not say they must come after accumulation. I said they must come after bare subsistence.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is a military matter. If they could come before accumulation of stores, it disposes of all your argument.

MR. WYNDHAM: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. You must prepare fifteen days subsistence for the advance, or you cannot make it.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is obviously a matter of opinion and judgment. The right hon. Gentleman says that we are condemning Lord Roberts. I say that I do not condemn Lord Roberts, because I have not knowledge enough to pronounce an opinion on the subject. That is precisely one of those subjects with which this inquiry, so strongly promised and so eagerly expected, must occupy itself. Apart from the allegations of the hon. Member for Westminster, which no one disputes—I mean the allegations of fact—there is a case here of some neglect of ordinary care in some quarter. But we are not in a position to apportion the blame which, I think, is due to someone. I decline altogether to attempt to do so with the knowledge that we have. We have two hon. Members here who have been to South Africa, and they take opposite views of the question. But the facts remain—the facts witnessed by the hon. Member for Westminster remain. The tremendous proportion of deaths remain, and they are surely sufficient to justify this discussion and to point the necessity for this inquiry. But I am indeed surprised to find that the right hon. Gentleman said nothing definite and positive about this committee of inquiry. Perhaps he was so much engaged in endeavouring to beat the wind and to raise party feeling that he forgot it. But it is obvious that no time should be lost, if it is not to be a sort of South African Committee to inquire after it is too late. It is to be a Committee to proceed to the spot and inquire; and I hope that that inquiry will be thorough and immediate. But there is another point. Several hon. Members have said that we may draw great lessons from all that has happened as to the future reorganisation of the Army Medical Department, and so forth. That is as to the future; and the state of things disclosed by the hon. Member for Westminster is of the past. But what of the present? There are 5,000 or 6,000 men in the hospitals at this moment—[Cries of "More!"]—some of them at Cape Town, in those hospitals which are independent of defective transport, and any faults of which cannot be distorted by the most ingenious mind into an attack on Lord Roberts. Have the Government and the War Office taken to heart any lessons from what has been disclosed and even from what is acknowledged by Lord Roberts and themselves to be a state of things which existed a few weeks ago? Are they guarding against a repetition of such horrors? Are we entitled to feel secure, as I hope that we are, that our countrymen will not be again exposed to that which they have already gone through with so much courage and endurance?

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I have two questions I wish to ask the

First Lord of the Treasury. My right hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition has just now urged that a Commission should be appointed immediately.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Lord Roberts urges it.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Lord Roberts only urges that men of common sense should be put on the Commission, whom, I gathered from his telegram, he did not anticipate would be found in this House. What I want to ask is, who is going to appoint this Commission? The right hon. Gentleman and his Government are persons concerned; their conduct is to be inquired into. If they are to appoint the Commission we know very well what it will be. It will be another whitewashing Commission. I do not know whether a Royal Commission or a Committee, or what, is to be appointed; but whatever it is, I think before the gentlemen are appointed we ought to have an understanding that their names should be submitted to the House of Commons, and that an opportunity should be given for some sort of discussion upon them. Otherwise, under the circumstances of the case, it is perfectly obvious that this Commission will give no satisfaction either to gentlemen on this side of the House or to the public generally. I do not know what are the views of the hon. Member for Westminster with regard to this Commission, which is proposed in consequence of the charges he has made, but I cannot suppose that he himself would not wish that the names should be submitted to the House and some opportunity given to Members of the House to suggest that this or that gentleman is not, perhaps, quite independent, or that some other gentleman should be put on the Committee. It is the only possible way in which an independent Commission can be obtained in this matter which will satisfy the exigencies of public opinion. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to tell us he treats all this with philosophical calm. The right hon. Gentleman is a philosopher, and I have before now said that I sit at his feet as regards his philosophy; I believe in his philosophy much more than in his politics. But this is not a mere question for philosophers; it is a question for practical men, and we want practical action in the matter. I am bound to say that unless we have this Committee or Commission practically appointed by both sides of the House the country will not regard it with that philosophical calm upon which my philosophical leader prides himself. There must be a full inquiry into the whole of this miserable state of things at Bloemfontein which has been revealed to the House now, but which has been carefully kept secret up till now. You may talk as much as you like about the correspondents, and say that they are independent. How is it, if the correspondents are independent, if they were not afraid of offending the powers that be out there, that while they were telegraphing and sending letters home, giving all sorts of news, some true, some false, they did not allude to what was going on at Bloemfontein? If it had not been for the fact that, fortunately for the country, the hon. Member for Westminster went there and had the courage to reveal in the press what he saw, we should know nothing whatever about this even now. There is another question I wish to ask. The Leader of the Opposition read a telegram that has been published and put into our hands to-day, saying that the War Office were receiving telegrams respecting the breakdown of hospitals. During the debate the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War said the War Office had been in correspondence with the Commander at Cape Town, and with the medical heads there. The Government promised, in giving us the Paper issued to us to-day, to lay every fact at their disposal before us. They have not done so. Here are two things we do not know, and I want to know whether the right hon. Gentleman will agree to lay before the House this correspondence with the authorities at Cape Town.

Resolution agreed to; to be reported upon Monday next. Committee also report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

Motion made, and Question, "That this House do now adjourn"—(Mr. Balfour)—put and agreed to.

MILITIA BALLOT BILL [H.L.].

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, some years ago I had the honour of dining at the Royal Academy, and a very distinguished literary man was called upon to respond to the toast of "Literature." He began by asking, "What is literature?" That rather alarmed his audience, but I hope your Lordships will not be alarmed if I also preface the remarks which I propose to make upon the Militia Ballot Bill of the Government by asking, "What is conscription?" It is absolutely necessary, in considering this question of the Militia Ballot, that we should come to a clear understanding as to what conscription means, because the word is constantly misapplied. Strange to say, those whom one would think would understand this question best are often those who misapply it most, and it really looks as if they do so purposely in order to give the Ballot a bad name, and make it stink in the nostrils of the people. Let me take my noble friend the Duke of Devonshire. He is head of the Defence Committee, and is certainly a man who ought to know what conscription means, and yet at a dinner in honour of Mr. Balfour he made a speech in which he said: "Lord Wemyss wishes the Government to bring in a drastic measure of conscription." Now, my Lords, the last thing in the world that I wish to see established is conscription in the rightful sense of the term. It is not conscription that I want, but the ballot. Then, again, the noble Duke spoke of a "drastic measure," but the Bill of the Government, the Second Reading of which I have the high privilege of moving, is, I consider, far too drastic, and, although I trust your Lordships will read it a second time, it will have to be considerably modified in Committee. What is conscription? Conscription means that every male inhabitant of a country is compulsorily obliged to join the army of that country, and is liable in youth and early manhood, and until well on in years, to be called to arms. It is said that this system is un-English, but that is not the case. So far from being un-English, conscription in the strongest and most complete sense of the word was the system by which in the early days of English history our armies were formed. It was a conscript army that won the glorious victories of Crecy and Poitiers in the time of Edward III. Therefore conscription is not un-English in reality, because it was, as I have said, a system by which our armies were raised in the early history of our country. This system, while it has fallen into desuetude in this country, has been taken up on the Continent. It was first taken up at the end of the Eighteenth Century in France, where, I believe, it was introduced by Marshal Jourdain, and now we see the system ruling throughout the Continent from the White Sea to the Mediterranean, and from the Ural Mountains to the Straits of Dover. Yes, to the Straits of Dover, and that makes all the difference. Were it not for what Cromwell called "that ditch," and what Mr. Gladstone called the "silver streak," every one of your Lordships must admit that we, too, in this country should, like our neighbours, be under a system of complete conscription. But this "ditch" is not absolutely to be trusted. Cromwell nearly 250 years ago warned the Englishmen of his day against trusting absolutely to it. He said, "Unless you can supplement your ships with men on horseback and men on foot you will not be safe." And 200 years later—fifty years ago—Lord Palmerston, speaking in the other House in favour of the resuscitation of the Militia, used very much the same language. He spoke of the necessity of resuscitating the Militia in order that we should be strong at home and be able to prevent the landing of hostile troops upon our shores, and said it was madness to trust to the navy alone, and all history showed—especially our own—how readily countries could be invaded. Everyone must feel that we should have a strong force at home, though not through conscription. My noble friend the Prime Minister, is, I notice, rather amused when the word "conscription" is mentioned, and yet he is the only public man I know of who has advocated conscription. He may, perhaps, be surprised to hear me say so; but the noble Marquess told the Primrose League that we must have for the defence of this country rifle clubs on the Swiss model. Now, what is the Swiss model? It is the most stringent conscription of any in Europe. Every man there, from youth to old age, is conscribed, and has to take up arms whenever required. My noble friend would himself escape, but in advocating that system he is hard upon his colleagues, for under it even the noble Duke the head of the Defence Committee and the Secretary of State for War would have to shoulder their muskets, learn the goose step, and, as a result of this war, learn also to burrow like rats and rabbits in the earth. But if we have not conscription we have, thanks to that "ditch," a military system which I hold to be admirably suited to our insular and Imperial position; and the foundation of that system is the Militia, which, according to the law of the land which is annually suspended, is properly raised by compulsion. By means of the Militia Ballot the right of the Crown is exercised to the military service of its subjects for home defence. What I want to consider is, what is the view and what has been the action of the Government with reference to the Militia ballot, which, as I have said, is the main principle of our military system, and upon which the defence of this country is supposed to rest? In an excellent pamphlet which has been sent to me, called "A Strong Army in a Free State," written by Mr. Coulton, there is a quotation from a speech of my noble friend the Prime Minister, delivered on 20th February this year. My noble friend is supposed to have said, with reference to the Militia ballot and the discussion in this House upon it, that "we were wandering on unknown ground"; and in the same chapter I find that the Under Secretary of State for War is quoted as having in another place alluded to "conscription and military ballot, and other such new devices." Let us for a moment survey the "unknown ground." to which my noble friend refers. It was on this "unknown ground" that our forefathers stood at the beginning of the nineteenth century, when the Militia and other Forces were gathered together to resist the invasion which was then threatening. Out of that "unknown ground" sprang those Militia regiments which my noble friend Lord Blythswood referred to as being of such great service in the early part of the century, and which were referred to by the Duke of Wellington—when backing up the Militia Bill of 1852—in the highest possible terms. So much for this "unknown ground" on which we are wandering. I now come to the "new devices." They were in full operation in the early part of the last century. They found a place in the Militia Act of 1852, and these "new devices" of the Under Secretary for War, namely, the ballot, formed an integral part of the army reform proposals of Lord Cardwell in 1870. But all this is a matter of history. Let us come down to the present time, and see what the action of the Secretary of State for War has been in reference to the question of the Militia ballot, this "new device." In 1898 the subject was under the consideration of your Lordships' House, and my noble friend said that, though the country was not prepared for the ballot, it was a valuable power to have in hand, having regard to possible emergencies, and one he would not readily part with. Then the noble Marquess went on to say that legislation would be necessary, for the system was obsolete, the machinery would not work, and required to be amended and brought, to use his own words, up to date. Then in the following year the Secretary of State for War brought in a Bill, the Second Reading of which I am about to move, to make the ballot available. In 1899 this Bill lay on the Table of the House, and, as the House was told in 1898, it was meant to meet emergencies. The year 1900 was an annus mirabilis of emergencies, and yet the Bill was left derelict by its author, the Secretary of State for War. I found it comatose, a foundling, on the steps of the War Office, and I have simply substituted my name on the back of it for that of the Secretary of State for War. The Bill was brought in to meet emergencies, but the Government have done what I venture to think no Government to my knowledge ever did before. I have been in Parliament since 1841, and I recollect no precedent for the course the Government have followed in introducing a measure which they said was of vital importance, and then issuing a whip to secure its rejection. That is what Her Majesty's Government have done in this case. We have read during this war of President Steyn sjamboking Boers who would not fight, but here we have a case of the Government sjamboking their party in order to induce them to throw out their own Bill. This is a policy which the ordinary Cross Bench mind cannot exactly understand. Possibly my noble friend may say there is no emergency. Why, we hear of nothing else but "emergency." Every measure that is brought in is an "emergency measure." You have emergency armies and emergency expenditure. Emergency camps have been formed for Volunteers, with emergency allowances for the wives and children of Volunteers attending camp. While this is the position, I cannot but think that "evasion" more aptly than "emergency" describes the Government measures and actions; for, instead of doing what they should do, instead of enforcing the existing system, they evade it, and by a Bill which was brought before the House a few days ago they will do much to destroy the Volunteer force by dividing it into two classes. Men who went into the force for home defence simply are now invited to become a sort of appendage, a sort of tail, to the different regiments of the Army, and in the result, when the excitement is over and has passed away, it will be found that a great evil has been done to the Volunteer force by dividing it into two classes—into "go-and-fights" and "stay-at-homes." I am sorry that the noble Viscount the Commander-in-Chief is absent from the House, as he generally is when an Army Bill is under discussion. I do not like to refer to a man's words in his absence, but he was reported to have said a few days ago at a Volunteer dinner that he hoped that in future a company of Volunteers would be attached in time of war to every regiment of the Line. I hope not. If they are, the Volunteer force will, I fear, cease to be a permanent institution in our military system such as it ought to be. The Government, instead of enforcing and perfecting the old military system, have thus, as regards the Volunteers, destroyed it. When my noble friend the Secretary of State for War laid his Bill on the Table in 1899 there was no emergency, all was quiet; but since then war has arisen, the "emergency" is there. Why then does he not proceed with his Militia Ballot "Emergency" Bill? The answer is plain—a dissolution, not in sight in 1899, is, we are told, not far distant now. There is nothing in what I am saying that should offend the Government, because we are perpetually reminded by them that the Militia Bill is most unpopular, and that the nation hates the idea of conscription and all that sort of thing. Now, my Lords, is this the case? The Government, in their emergency measures, are trading on the patriotism of Volunteers, begging them to become soldiers, but they absolutely ignore the patriotism of the country, and they say that the people of this country would not stand the existing law being put in force even for the defence of their hearths and homes. I am sure that is a libel on the people of this country, and that any Government which had the courage and manliness to speak out and submit this modified form of service for home defence only, would meet with ready response. I may be wrong, but that is my conviction. For nearly forty years I have been working and agitating this question, and wherever I have spoken in any public place of the desirability of having a modified form of compulsory service for home defence, I have met with unanimous support. Such was the view of a meeting of artisans on the Shaftesbury Estate, whom I addressed in 1875, on the occasion of their forming a Volunteer company. And how do we stand in the year 1900? What is the feeling on the subject at the present moment on the part of what I may call the intelligent portion of the community? Here I can speak with accurate data, for I hold in my hand a circular which was addressed to Lords Lieutenant, High Sheriffs, chairmen of quarter sessions, chairmen and vice-chairmen of county councils, mayors, provosts, and presidents of chambers of commerce and of chambers of agriculture. This circular contained two questions, the first being as regards our present military system—

> "Are you of opinion that such a state of things should be allowed to continue; and that the safety of the United Kingdom—and all that implies—should be dependent upon the patriotic, self-sacrificing action of a half-trained Volunteer force—held subject only to fourteen days' notice to quit?"

There were 353 replies to that question, in 75 per cent. of which the answer was "no." The circular proceeded to explain what the Militia Ballot was and how it might be applied—not in the drastic form proposed in my noble friend's Bill, but in a modified form. It was suggested that the Ballot law would be sufficient for its purpose if modified, so that instead of applying to all men between eighteen and thirty-five (as the law now stands) it would be sufficient that once in a man's life, on attaining the age of nineteen or twenty, he should have to take his chance of the Ballot, and, if struck, serve for say two years in the Militia and say seven in the Militia Reserve. The second question asked was—

> "Are you of opinion that such a modified form of compulsory service, with the above exemptions, for Home Defence only is right and reasonable, and ought to be readily accepted by the people?"

Out of the 353 replies the majority was two to one in favour of such modified form of compulsory service. Therefore I believe that all this talk about the unpopularity of the Militia Ballot for service at home is all rubbish. If we could only get a Government—I have not seen one yet—who had the courage to state their convictions, how much stronger they would be! I am perfectly certain that if your Lordships simply followed the dictates of your inner consciousness you could not but give a similar answer to that which has been given by all the authorities in the counties and towns of Great Britain to whom I have referred. I therefore trust that—sjambok or no sjambok—your Lordships will support the Second Reading of this Bill, and in supporting it remember this, that you are not voting for the application of the ballot. You are only voting for what the Secretary of State told us two years ago was essential—namely, that this Power, which has become obsolete and out of date, should be brought into working order. That is all this Bill does, and I dare denial on that point.

Although the times may not be alarming they are anxious, and I will tell your Lordships why. When some six or eight months ago I was advocating and pressing upon my noble friend the Secretary of State for War the advisability of having a Volunteer Reserve—an ideal thing, which they have actually botched at the War Office by the way they have dealt with it—I received a letter from an English military attaché abroad. He said in his letter :—

"I am glad to see you are agitating for a Volunteer Reserve, for, believe me, it is essential that England should be invulnerable and strong in the month of November."

The Paris Exhibition will then be over, and I have heard that the Naval authorities in the Mediterranean hold absolutely the same opinion. I pass from this military attaché to a greater authority, and I read in a remarkable speech, that was made not long ago, this sentence —

"It is not necessarily because in themselves they are more important, but if you look round you you will see that the elements and causes of menace and peril are, though slowly, accumulating, and may accumulate to such a point as to require our most earnest and active effort to repel them."

Those are the words of the Prime Minister addressing the Primrose League. Then on 12th February my noble friend Lord Kimberley, who is so much respected in this House, and who always talks the very best and soundest sense, said—

"All around us there was a temper displayed by our neighbours which should make everyone pause and reflect upon the position in which we find ourselves."

Therefore, you have these great authorities saying that if this is not a time of peril it is a time of anxiety ; and no man with his eyes and ears open, and knowing anything of the state of things as regards our armaments, can fail to see that it is desirable that England should be strong at all times, because, if she is strong her Foreign Minister is powerful for good, and if weak he is not. I venture to hope that something will be done to strengthen our home defence, and I would appeal to the independence and patriotism of your Lordships to cast aside all personal and party considerations and vote for what you conscientiously believe to be right and necessary in this matter. If you think that our military system requires that the Bill should be passed I trust you will vote freely and boldly for it. The safety of the nation should be taken out of the domain of party. Foreign affairs and Imperial questions are in the main so dealt with. But where would these be—where would the Empire itself be if it is weak at the heart and we are vulnerable at home ?

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Earl of Wemyss.)

EARL COWPER : My Lords, I do not think my noble friend need have wasted any words in urging us to consider this question not from a party point of view, but from the point of view of the interests of the country. I am sure we shall all do that. For my own part, I have never, even in former days, been in any way taken with the idea of compulsory service, however small or however large. I will not stop to draw the line of difference between conscription and ballot and the present Bill ; they each depend, to a larger or less degree, on compulsion, and we have always looked upon compulsion in this country as a thing not to be resorted to unless it can be proved to be absolutely necessary. If such has been my opinion till now, I cannot say that the events—the momentous events—of the past year —one of the most trying years we have ever gone through—have in the least degree altered my opinion. The one thing that is looked upon with most satisfaction at home, and which foreign nations cannot help admiring, is the magnificent way in which last December, when the country was in difficulties, and serious complications with foreign countries were possible, the whole nation rose to the occasion. All classes of the community volunteered for service, and it was felt that if ten times the number of Volunteers were wanted, ten times the number would be forthcoming. Not only the upper and the lower classes, who have always fought for their country, but also the great middle class, who are, generally speaking, left out in the cold because they furnish neither officers nor men, proved that they, too, were endowed with patriotic feeling and were ready to die for their country. With such an exhibition before us of the facilities for getting Volunteers whenever we want them there is less reason than ever for resorting to compulsion in order to fill up our ranks, and I think it would be almost a slight upon these gallant men to immediately bring in a Bill for compulsion. My noble friend has endeavoured to draw a distinction between defensive and offensive operations. I do not think he would mind having conscription for all purposes, but he does not press for that; he only proposes conscription for the defence of the country. But is it for home defence that we are most likely to want men? In all that has been written and said on the defence of our shores in case of invasion, those have had the best of the argument who have affirmed that as long as we have the command of the sea—and we all admit that when we once lose the command of the sea we are altogether done for—or, at any rate, as long as no other country has command of the sea, it will be absolutely impossible to land an army of any appreciable size upon our shores. I will not press that point, because I know it is disputed, and it is said that we must have something else to fall back upon. Behind the Navy we have our troops and Militia at home, and an excellent and glorious force of Volunteers, which has now attained to such perfection and numbers—so many thousands of men — a force which the Government have expressed their intention of endeavouring, if possible, to increase and to bring to an even higher state of efficiency. That force must, on the whole—in spite of the Bill to which the noble Earl on the Cross Benches so much objected, and which I supported the other night and see no harm in—be a defensive force, because nine-tenths of the Volunteers have no intention whatever of ever going outside the country, and enlist entirely for purposes of defence. It appears to me that where we might be in difficulties is not in defending our own shores, but in defending our world-wide Empire beyond the seas. We may have to send troops at any moment to any part of the world; and in that matter this Bill will not help us in the smallest degree. If we are to have conscription, let us have it for what we want it for, and not for what we do not want it for. If the Government, after carefully considering the whole position, were to bring forward a scheme of this kind, I should say that we were bound to support it whatever our individual feelings may be. But the Government do not want this scheme, and for the House of Lords to try and force it upon them is preposterous. The only excuse there can be for passing this Bill is that it does not much matter what opinion we express in the House of Lords; but I think we ought always to keep before ourselves the idea — the imaginary idea if you like to put it so— that if we vote for a thing it will have some effect. I consider that the only effect this would have, if acted upon, would be a bad effect, and, if not acted upon, it would bring the House into disrepute. I hope that my noble friend will not press for a division, but if he does I trust your Lordships will throw the Bill out by a substantial majority.

LORD NEWTON: My Lords, I have sat for such a short time in this House that it may be thought unfitting that I should express astonishment at anything that occurs here; but I must own that I am filled not with astonishment but with amazement at the conduct of the noble Marquess, the Secretary of State for War. Last year the noble Marquess presented a Bill which was identically the same as the Bill brought in by my noble friend Lord Wemyss; he argued in favour of his Bill to the best of his ability, and now we are asked, I might almost say we are driven down to the House and ordered, to vote against it. I fancy I am not wrong in assuming that this is a very unusual circumstance in your Lordships' House. I do not know what arguments the noble Marquess is going to employ to-day, but if I chose I could adduce very strong arguments in favour of the Bill now being discussed by merely quoting from the noble Marquess's speech of last year. I will, however, content myself by saying that, having had an opportunity of considering the Government's proposals for home defence and the proposal which has been made by the noble Earl, I emphatically prefer the latter. I do not wish to do the noble Marquess any injustice, because I am sure everyone will admit that he has had the interests of his Department at heart as much as, if not more than, any of his predecessors. But the Government's proposals, for which he is responsible, are based upon conjecture, upon invitation, upon appeals, and upon the somewhat artless assumption that the present military enthusiasm will last indefinitely. Nothing new is suggested, except it be the suggestion of the Prime Minister that the ladies of the Primrose League should undertake the defence of the country. At all events, the proposal of the noble Earl has the merit of being a definite, a practical, and, to my mind, a sound proposal. There is, I presume, no doubt as to the value of our Militia. I take it that one of the lessons of the present war has been to demonstrate that after the Regular Army the Militia is much the most valuable asset we possess. Although considerably below its strength the Militia has been able to provide between 20,000 and 30,000 men for South Africa. Those battalions, if I mistake not, went out as separate units under their own officers. Could the other branches of the Auxiliary Forces have done the same? It is perfectly clear that they could have done nothing of the kind. The Volunteers cannot be compared to the Militia in regard to value, and under those circumstances one would have supposed that the Government would have welcomed any opportunity for increasing so valuable a force. Instead of that we are asked to vote against the rational and common-sense proposal of the noble Earl. This is not the first time that this proposal has been discussed during the present session, and we are familiar with the arguments made use of against it. The last time the subject was discussed the noble Marquess the Prime Minister said he had heard that there was a possibility of the youth of this country flying in shoals from our shores and taking refuge in America and elsewhere, where conscription did not prevail. The Secretary of State did not go so far as that. He held that it would be extremely unwise to make any radical changes in our military system until after the war was over; but the long and the short of those arguments was that the country would not stand such a measure. What steps have been taken to ascertain the opinion of the country in this respect? How can the noble Marquess or anyone else know that the country will not stand it? My firm belief is that if the proposal had been made when the House met it would not have been discounted by the electors, but would have been recognised as a more or less painful necessity. Of course if the proposals in this Bill are described in exaggerated language, and unfair comparisons with conscription as it prevails in foreign countries are made, it is not unnatural that the proposals should be unpopular; but the noble Earl does not suggest the expatriation of the British youth to Wei-hai-wei, Fashoda, or the other side of the globe. His proposal simply is that a limited portion of the population should ballot, and, if the worst comes to the worst, should be called upon to do some eight or nine months military training in the course of their lives. This extremely modified form of compulsion is generally denounced as "un-English." I have but a vague idea of the meaning of that word, but I suppose it means something discreditable. All I can say is that it is very much more discreditable that by far the greater portion of the able bodied men in this country should deliberately shirk their duty as citizens, and that of the male population between the ages of twenty-five and forty not one in ten should discharge the most elementary form of military duty. This is the result of strict adherence—I might almost say slavish adherence—to the Volunteer system. My chief objection to the Government emergency scheme is that it merely amplifies and exaggerates this unsatisfactory and antiquated system. The Government's proposals really amount to this, that the miserably small minority who are now taking the burden of national defence on their shoulders are to do double as much, treble as much, four times as much as they have in the past. I am not ashamed to admit that in common with the noble Earl I feel that one of the first duties of the citizen of a civilised state is to take some share in defending his home and property, and I would go as far as to say that in my view this obligation is almost as great as the obligation to pay rates and taxes. There is, at all events, one point on which both parties will agree, and that is that we ought to show to the world that there is nothing to be gained by attacking us; but we are doing precisely the reverse. Every day we see our responsibilities and our liabilities increase, although I believe that when Ministers come into office they are determined that, as far as they are concerned, not one inch shall be added to the Empire. I have no doubt that when he took office in 1880 Mr. Gladstone never, in his wildest dreams, thought that he would saddle this country with the occupation of Egypt and the Soudan. I doubt also whether the noble Marquess thought he would find it necessary to annex the Transvaal and the Orange Free State, or to enter upon a Chinese expedition. Yet this is what is happening. Every day we see our Empire increasing, and the chance of hostilities with our neighbours increasing also. For my part I intend to support the Bill, because it seems to me to be contrary to common sense not to adjust our military system in accordance with the conditions of the times. I do not for a moment anticipate that the noble Earl will be successful, but I would urge upon him, although it is quite unnecessary for me to do so, that even if he should be defeated to-day, he should continue putting forward his project, in season and out of season, until more rational views prevail.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, I have had occasion to address your Lordships not infrequently upon this subject, and I think I can certainly trust my memory when I say that on no one of those occasions have I ever objected to the proposal of the noble Earl on the ground that there was anything un-English about the ballot; nor was anything of the sort suggested by my noble friend who sits behind me. My noble friend recommended your Lordships not to vote for the motion, on the ground that it was inopportune at the present time; and the question is, are we justified, situated as we are at present, in adopting this proposal? It is, of course, for your Lordships to decide how you will deal with the measure; but, speaking on behalf of Her Majesty's Government, I claim that it is for us to say whether we think this Bill should be persevered with at the present time, and I trust that that issue will not be obscured by the eloquence and the epigrams of the noble Earl on the Cross Benches. The noble Earl gave to the House what purported to be an historical account of the origin of the Bill; but it was not a complete account. May I remind your Lordships of the origin of the Bill and of the manner in which the question has been dealt with by Her Majesty's Government? In the year 1898, when the noble Earl brought the matter to your Lordships' attention, I admitted to him and to your Lordships that, in my opinion, the existence of the Militia ballot was of vital importance to the military system of this country. I said that nothing would induce me to part with that great reserve of power; and I also added that the machinery of the ballot was, in my belief, of a more or less obsolete character and required revision. I therefore promised to have that machinery examined, and if the result of that examination justified such a course, to introduce a Bill; but I remember distinctly saying—and that is the chapter of history the noble Earl left out—that her Majesty's Government were not to be understood as pledging themselves either to have recourse to the ballot or to pass a ballot Bill through the Houses of Parliament in that or any other session. I kept my promise. The machinery of the ballot was examined, and the result of the examination went to show that it was by no means so obsolete or unintelligible as had been supposed; and in 1899 I introduced a Bill into your Lordships' House. It has been suggested by the noble Lord who spoke last that we have changed our minds. I say we have not changed our minds. We have laid a Bill on the Table in order that your Lordships might see the form it would take should legislation become necessary, but there never was any announcement of an intention to pass that measure, and there consequently never was an abandonment of such an intention. Then, at the beginning of this session, in the month of February, the noble Earl came down to your Lordships' House and proclaimed the existence of an emergency and called upon us to introduce the ballot. It is true that on the very evening on which the discussion took place he altered the terms of his motion, but we all remember his speech. It proceeded much on the lines of that to which we have just listened, and it was clearly an appeal to the House to decide that for the purpose of meeting the immediate military necessities of this country we should resort to the ballot. On this occasion the noble Earl has appropriated our Bill, and has asked your Lordships to read it a second time, but he has done so with a remarkable expression of his own opinion. He has circulated a paper in which he tells us that enlightened, patriotic public opinion is prepared to accept—what? Not the Bill of Her Majesty's Government, which he is now moving, but another Bill enacting a modified form of compulsory Militia service, as described in an accompanying Paper. When we turn to the accompanying Paper we find a measure sketched out entirely different from that introduced by Her Majesty's Government last year. It is a measure based on the assumption that every man in this kingdom at the age of nineteen or twenty is to take his chance in the ballot to serve two years in the Militia, and perhaps seven years in the Militia Reserve. It is a totally different Bill.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: It is much more moderate.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: Possibly—but it is totally different in principle. But that is not the only point on which the conduct of the noble Earl seems to be somewhat remarkable. The matter was, in his belief, one of extreme urgency in February last. We are now in July. During that long interval the noble Earl has been marking time, and now, after six months, he produces a Bill, not the Bill he would like to see in the statute book, but a Bill which, according to his own showing, does not meet the requirements of the situation. I submit there are two questions which, as practical men of business, we have to consider. The first is—is there the remotest chance of passing this Bill into law during the present session? I cannot conceive that any one will say there is any such chance. The other question is this—supposing that you were to press it through both Houses, would it help you in the least to meet that emergency upon the gravity of which the noble Earl has dwelt in such forcible terms? Your Lordships should clearly understand that the noble Earl advocates this Bill as an improvement upon, or as a substitute for, the emergency measures of Her Majesty's Government; and I say fearlessly that, if his measure or our measures deserve to be characterised by the epithet which he bestowed upon our measures the other evening, it is his measure and not the measures to which we have had recourse. How long would it take the noble Earl, supposing this Bill were to pass, to raise 20,000, or 30,000, or 40,000 men for the Militia? How long would it take him to arm them, to equip them, to provide them with the necessary officers, and to incorporate them in our military cadres? I venture to think that months would pass before a single man, under the measure which the noble Earl has advocated, would be fit to be placed in the fighting line. The noble Earl has ridiculed the measures of Her Majesty's Government, and I do not think they were spoken of very respectfully by the noble Lord who spoke from the back benches (Lord Newton). The noble Earl suggested that everything depends upon the strength of our home defences. The noble Lord on the back benches said that all our measures have rested upon conjecture.

LORD NEWTON: So they have.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I differ entirely. Take the Royal Reserve battalions. We have got at this moment over 20,000 men, whom I will not describe, but as to whom I should like to quote a sentence from a minute of the Commander-in-Chief. This is what the Commander-in-Chief says of the Royal Reserve battalions—

"As regards the conduct and bearing of those old soldiers who have responded to the Queen's appeal, I have just received reports from eight of the eleven general officers commanding districts in which they are quartered. These reports uniformly describe their bearing, appearance, and conduct as in every way satisfactory, and state that they are likely to be of good value for service at home."

The Commander-in-Chief goes on to speak of them as—"A force of about 24,000 disciplined and trained soldiers, whose presence in the country was and is an invaluable addition to its defensive strength."

There is no conjecture about that. There is a certain amount of conjecture about the proposal of the noble Earl. These are soldiers whom we have got, and who are spoken of in these terms by the highest military authority in this country. In addition to those we have made very fair progress with the new permanent battalions which we are raising. We have about 5,000 men already. We have about 6,000 men in the newly-raised batteries of the Royal Artillery. I do not think there is any conjecture or imagination about them. As something was said with regard to our treatment of the Volunteers, I trust I may be pardoned if I quote a few words from the report of the Inspector-General of Auxiliary Forces, who has lately had occasion to inspect a large number of those emergency camps to which the noble Earl referred. This is what he says—

"I have this month inspected in camp fourteen Volunteer and nine Militia battalions.

"The improvement which has taken place in both branches from being in camp for prolonged periods is very marked indeed. The behaviour of the men has been excellent. The Volunteers have for the first time been given an opportunity of making themselves really efficient, and they have readily grasped it. 202 battalions out of 217 have applied to come into special camp, exclusive of Volunteer Artillery and Engineers. The battalions of Volunteers which I have seen have come into camp in large numbers, and I have been greatly struck by the improvement which has taken place in every battalion at the end of its fourteen days in camp. The measure of bringing the Volunteers into camp has so far been a remarkable success."

That, again, is a measure about which there is no conjecture, but a great deal of solid fact. With respect to the Militia, we are certainly not prepared to take any action which might be interpreted in the country as a suggestion that we look to the ballot as the proper means of meeting the exceptional military pressure to which we have been subjected this year; I earnestly hope, however, that your Lordships will not suppose that we desire to shirk what I would call the Militia problem. On the contrary, we regard the future of the Militia as, I would almost say, the most important of the questions of Army reorganisation with which it will be our duty to deal. If there had been any tendency on our part to treat that force with indifference I think the manner in which it has lately come forward would have made it impossible for us, even if we had desired to do so, to neglect its interests in the future. But noble Lords who are interested in the Militia may say to me, "If you have got a complete plan for dealing with the Militia why do you not disclose it in this House?" I trust your Lordships will think that I am not unreasonable when I say that it would be impossible for us at this time to present to Parliament a full and complete scheme for dealing with the Militia. The question of Militia organisation is so closely and intimately connected with that of Army organisation that it is impossible to deal thoroughly with the Militia question without touching upon those organic changes with which it is well understood that it is not our intention or our duty to proceed during the present session. The time of Parliament does not permit it, and there are distinguished soldiers now serving out of the country the benefit of whose experience we should endeavour to reap. Those are, to my mind, sufficient reasons for not precipitately touching these problems of Army organisation; but I have no wish to adopt in regard to the Militia what might seem to your Lordships dilatory tactics. If I may, I should like to describe some of the measures affecting the Militia with regard to which our mind is made up and which we see our way to adopting in the immediate future, leaving for further discussion and consideration other measures, which, for the reasons I gave just now, must stand over for the present. I may remind your Lordships, in the first place, that we have already made certain concessions to the force which, I believe, have been well received. We have given the Militia messing allowance during training. We have appointed at the headquarters of the Army a high officer whose special duty is to attend to the Auxiliary forces, and who will be assisted in regard to Militia matters by an officer having experience of that force. We have given to the Militia battalions, for the first time, regimental transport to the extent of five vehicles per battalion and a certain number of horses. Then I come to the question of the clothing of the Militia. I am sorry that my noble friend the Duke of Bedford, who called attention to this matter so pointedly the other evening, is not here to-day. I promised the noble Duke that I would make inquiry into the subject, and I admit that as a result of the inquiries I have made I am satisfied that in the matter of clothing we have allowed what I suppose I might call considerations of frugality to prevail rather too much, and that clothing has sometimes been issued to the Militia which one could scarcely ask a British soldier to wear without some injury to his feelings of self-respect. I am prepared to say that action will be taken without loss of time to remedy that grievance, and although I would rather not go into matters of detail I will say that I will undertake that in the future clothing shall be issued to the force under conditions which will make it impossible for any colonel of Militia to make such a complaint as that which was made by the noble Duke the other evening. Then we have paid a good deal of attention to the instruction of Militia officers. We have prepared a scheme under which Militia officers will be given much more frequent opportunities of attending courses of instruction, and that under conditions which will avoid their being put to any private expense during the course of their attendance. I hope we may also be able to do something to add to the efficiency of Militia non-commissioned officers, by which I do not mean the permanent staff, but those of non-commissioned officers who belong to the Militia. They require a larger amount of training than they get, and I hope we shall be able to arrange that they shall receive that training and that the terms on which they will receive it will be such as to render them willing and ready to submit to it. I will say one word on a much vexed question, the question of the training of Militia recruits. I have discovered a very remarkable divergence of opinion with regard to that subject; it is one of those cases in which undoubtedly there is a very great deal to be said on both sides. The complaint, as I understand it, is this—that when the Militia recruit is taken to the depôt his training is neglected by the depôt staff, that he has too heavy fatigues imposed upon him, and, above all, that, owing to the practice of training these men at the depôt, a good deal of what may be conveniently described as poaching goes on—the man who goes to the depôt as a Militia recruit being annexed for the Line by the depôt officer. On the other hand there are certain advantages which the depôt undoubtedly possesses. It is there to receive a man at any time and give him his training at the season of the year most convenient to himself, he can be clothed and equipped at once, and he has the advantage of instruction by a permanent staff which I should be inclined to say was better qualified than the permanent staff of the battalion. I can only indicate, in regard to this measure, the direction in which our mind is moving. I hope we shall be able to increase the length of the training undergone by the Militia recruits. These young men join at a time when they are not settled down in life, and probably the addition of two or three months to their period of training would not be regarded as a hardship. If that be done, as it probably will, it is our intention that that portion of the training which takes place with the battalion should be increased, while with regard to that portion of it which might still be undergone at the depôt, I think we might meet some of the complaints which have been made by arranging that one or more Militia officers should be attached to the depôt for the purpose of watching over the interests of the men belonging to their own battalion. Those seem to me to be measures calculated to meet some of the objections to which we have listened. Then I wish to say one word in regard to the most important question of the conditions of service of the Militia and the bounties paid to the Militiamen. A scheme has been put before us and considered under which the whole of the Militia might be allowed to accept liability for service abroad, under which, in consideration of their assuming that liability, the bounties might be considerably increased, with the further condition that the Militia Reserve, which is so unpopular in the estimation of Militia officers, should be put an end to altogether, the whole force accepting the same liability as that under which the Militia Reserve now serves. That is, I must say, a scheme which, to my mind, possesses a great many attractions, and I believe—we have reason to know it—that it is acceptable to a very large number of Militia officers. Whether it would be equally acceptable to the rank and file of the Militia is, perhaps, a matter of conjecture; we only know that the men are very ready to join the existing Militia Reserve, and it seems not unlikely that, in consideration of a higher bounty, they would be ready as a force to accept the same liability as that of the present Militia Reservists. I know that such a scheme has been advocated in this House by a noble Lord whose knowledge of Army matters and whose caution in dealing with them will not be questioned—I mean Lord Northbrook. And I know that when Lord Northbrook made the suggestion he was followed by the noble Earl the leader of the Opposition, who expressed himself in decided terms against any proposal calculated to alter the conditions of service of the Militia force—I mean those conditions under which they are at present liable to serve only within the limits of the United Kingdom. That would, of course, be a very momentous and far-reaching change, and I am not ashamed to tell your Lordships that we must take time to consider it. I have gone into it rather fully for this reason, that it is very closely indeed connected with the question which has been raised by the noble Earl this evening. We none of us,

The Marquess of Lansdowne.

I think, have ever contemplated that there should be compulsion in any shape or form except for service within the limits of the United Kingdom, and it would follow that if the kind of change were made which I adumbrated just now, if the whole of the Militia were to be regarded as liable on an emergency to serve outside the limits of the United Kingdom, you would place the ballot in an infinitely more remote position in the background of military politics than it occupies at the present time. I trust, therefore, your Lordships do not think what I have said in regard to this proposal is irrelevant to the subject we are now discussing. While these matters are still under consideration I do not think we are unreasonable when we ask your Lordships not to proceed further with a Ballot Bill. If it is possible that the conditions of service for the whole force may be changed, if, again, it is possible that the removal of some of those grievances of which we have heard so much should have the result of again filling the ranks of the Militia, the necessity for the ballot will diminish or will disappear; and I therefore think that, far from being, as has been suggested by the noble Earl, illogical and inconsistent because, having introduced this Bill last year, we do not press on with it at present, we are taking the only course which logic and consistency dictate for us. As to the argument of the noble Earl on the Cross Benches, there seem to me, if I may be allowed to say so, to be two weak points in his position. One of them is his inability to recognise any merit in any measures except those which he has himself initiated; the other weak point is this, I think he altogether underrates the dislike with which compulsion in any form, even in the modest form which he advocates, is regarded by the people of this country.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: How do you know?

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I know it, among other things, from this, that when I introduced this Bill last year—and the Bill did not really bring us a yard nearer to compulsion—I was inundated with remonstrances from all parts of the United Kingdom, proceeding from people who believed that even that short step carried them nearer to the thing they abhorred. This is felt very strongly, and I do not think the Prime Minister used language of exaggeration last year when he said that at this moment an attempt to revert to the ballot would create consternation in every cottage in this country. For these reasons I would say to your Lordships that while if it could be shown that resort to the ballot could be proved to be an absolute necessity we ought to sit here until Christmas in order to pass it, under present circumstances we shall only be creating a false impression and wasting the time of Parliament if we vote with the noble Earl for the Second Reading of this Bill. I propose to ask your Lordships, therefore, to vote on the previous question.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: Before your Lordships vote on this Bill I wish, in justice to myself, to put clearly before the House the question on which you are going to vote. I deny that my history, as my noble friend has suggested, was incomplete. The noble Marquess in 1898 said that the machinery of the ballot was obsolete at that time, and that if used at all it would have to be brought up to date. In 1899 my noble friend brought in this Bill, but it is not to impose the ballot, although I myself would be prepared to see that done to-morrow, because I believe we shall never have a satisfactory state of things in an emergency unless we have the courage to enforce the existing law. That, however, is not what we are going to vote on, but on the question that the obsolete machinery should be brought up to date. This is a vital question, and if I can get a teller I shall divide the House.

The previous Question was put, whether the original Question be now put.

BEER RETAILERS' AND SPIRIT GROCERS' LICENCES (IRELAND) (No. 2) BILL.

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF ERNE: My Lords, the objects of this Bill are—(a) to put applications in Ireland for spirit grocers' retail licences and beer retail licences (in each case for consumption off the premises) on the same footing; (b) to extend to Irish licensing authorities in respect of such licences the powers of the English Act of 1882 (45 and 46 Vict. c. 34). The Bill becomes necessary because as the Act of 1882 only provided in terms against its application to Scotland it was considered, until a recent decision in the Irish Courts to the contrary, that it inferentially applied to Ireland as well as to England. The Bill has passed through the House of Commons, and has, I believe, the full assent of the Government of Ireland.

Moved, That the Bill be now read a second time.—(The Earl of Erne.)

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: The Bill which the noble Earl has brought before the House has the approval of the Irish Government, but I shall have a few drafting Amendments to move when the Bill is in Committee.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

DIOCESAN REGISTRATION BILL [H.L.].

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, this is a Bill of only four clauses, to enable the Diocesan Documents to be preserved and kept intact over the country. At present some Acts of Parliament require deeds, etc., to be registered, but others omit the direction. The record of a great variety of ecclesiastical documents is very imperfect, and every now and then some such record which is very much wanted cannot be found. I will give your Lordships an instance of what I mean. In 1881 the then vicar of St. George's, Bickley, in Kent, was appointed Dean of Wells, and the question arose in whose patronage Bickley was vested. It was known that an agreement as to patronage had been signed by all parties concerned, but no agreement could anywhere be found. After five months of search and inquiry, and before the lapse, the signed agreement was ultimately discovered amongst some old bankruptcy papers in a disused solicitor's office. It is obvious that that is not a proper state of things. In the spring of 1898 application was made to the Canterbury Diocesan Registry for a patronage agreement relating to Christ Church, Beckenham, which it was stated had been signed by all parties in 1876, but no trace of it could then be found in the registry or elsewhere. It had never been registered. This Bill proposes that documents of this kind should in all cases be registered. I do not think it is likely to meet with opposition from any quarter, and I hope your Lordships will give it a Second Reading.

MILITIA SERGEANT-MAJORS AND QUARTERMASTERS.

LORD BLYTHSWOOD: My Lords, I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when he will give effect to his promise of conferring warrant rank on sergeant-majors of Militia; and when the additional allowance for quartermasters of embodied Militia will be authorised.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: As regards the first part of the question, some time has necessarily been taken up in considering the changes in rates of pay and pension which will accompany the grant of warrant rank to sergeant-majors of Militia. We shall, I hope, very shortly be in a position to issue an Army Order on the subject. As regards the second part of the question, the regulation making the grant referred to to Militia adjutants and quartermasters has, I believe, already appeared.

MILITARY LANDS BILL [H.L.].

Debate on Amendment moved after Third Reading resumed (according to Order).

LORD THRING: With the permission of the House I desire to withdraw my Amendments to Clause 3 of this Bill, and I also wish to say a few words of explanation. The two Amendments in the schedule were important ones—one was to allow persons injuriously affected by the scheme, as well as those actually interested in the land, to appear at the public inquiry; and the other was to allow landlords to obtain resumption of their land when required for building purposes. I hope the noble Marquess will have these Amendments introduced when the Bill is in the other House. I do not wish to oppose the measure or to imperil it. What I do wish is that what seems to be a new doctrine should meet with the disapprobation of this House—namely, the doctrine that in order to facilitate the passage of a Bill it is desirable that some of the really substantial clauses should be wrapped in a cloud of generalities. I hope also that the House will express its strong disapproval of a new phraseology which has grown up lately in Acts of Parliament which allows a Department to adapt actual enactments to the particular exigencies of the case.

Amendments, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

Moved, "That the Bill do pass."

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): I must plead guilty to being somewhat late in the criticisms which I have made, but I can assure my noble friend the Secretary of State for War that it is not my desire to in anyway arrest the progress of this Bill. I fully realise the enormous importance of obtaining land for rifle ranges, and I recognise that cases may occur in which a recalcitrant landlord may prevent land which is absolutely necessary being acquired. I should like to call my noble friend's attention to the condition in which Clause 3 leaves the House. It is practically taken from the Acts which enable parish councils to apply to county councils for power to hire land for allotments. The compulsory hiring of land is, with the exception of the provision in the Allotments Act, absolutely a new principle in legislation, and I regret that the conditions under which the compulsory hiring of land for rifle ranges is to be allowed are not more clearly expressed in the Bill. Clauses 9 and 10 of the Act of 1894, which are incorporated in the third clause of this Bill, are extremely difficult to understand. In fact, if I may venture to say so, they are extremely bad clauses, and I would suggest to my noble friend that when the Bill is in the House of Commons an attempt should be made to remodel the clause. Allotments and rifle ranges are very different in character. It is a very different thing to give a parish council or a borough council power to hire compulsorily a few acres of land for allotments, and to give public bodies power to hire a very large extent of country for rifle ranges. There are, therefore, in the clauses which are incorporated, several provisions wholly inapplicable to rifle ranges, and at the same time there are omissions which, I think, the noble Marquess should give his attention to. The omissions I refer to particularly are those which were brought to the attention of the House by Lord Thring and Lord Portsmouth. In the first place, there is the question of those whose land is not absolutely taken, but who may have land adjoining which may be injuriously affected. This question could hardly arise in the case of allotments. Therefore, I venture to think that, in addition to those whose land is actually taken, those whose interests are likely to be injuriously affected should also have power to be heard by the tribunal before whom the question comes. In the case of hiring for allotments, leases are confined to a maximum of thirty-five years. Allotments do not occupy a very large track of country—a few acres at the outside; but in the case of rifle ranges a very large amount of country may be affected, and it is possible that the land may within thirty-five years become a very valuable building estate. I would ask the House whether it is not fair that, as owners of land hired compulsorily for allotments have power to resume possession in cases where, for instance, minerals are discovered, there should also be a power vested in owners under this Bill to appeal for the resumption of their land on other grounds. I would also suggest that if there is any difficulty in carrying this out the case might be met by the maximum length of the lease being reduced to twenty years. There is one other matter. In the case of allotments, as a rule, the originating local authority is the parish council. When a parish council desires to hire land compulsorily for allotments, the first step is to apply to the county council for leave to do so. The county council institutes a local inquiry and ascertains whether the land has not been obtainable by agreement, and whether the opposition is or is not worthy of consideration. If they think fit they give the necessary powers. From the county council's decision after the inquiry there is a further appeal to the Local Government Board. I should like to point out that the preliminary inquiry is eliminated altogether from this Bill. I would emphasise what has fallen from Lord Thring as to the power given to a Government Department to adapt or in any way alter an Act of Parliament. I do not think that is a power which should be given to any Government Department. I hope that, in the passage of the Bill through the House of Commons, clauses will be enacted in the Bill itself which will show those whose land is to be taken exactly what the process is under which it will be taken. That will be much more satisfactory than referring to two clauses in another Act which contain provisions that do not apply to military lands at all, and which omit several precautions which I think in this case ought to be taken.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I hope the noble and learned Lord will not suspect that I complain of his tenacity in this matter. He has given us advice which has been useful, but I am afraid I am in a difficult position, because I have had expert advice from the noble and learned Lord, and I have had other expert advice which does not agree, and therefore I think I am entitled to the sympathy of your Lordships. I am reluctant to accept the schedule proposed by Lord Thring, because there is an objection to including in an Act of Parliament what is in effect an epitome of other Acts of Parliament. I admit that there is a great deal to be said for my noble friend's view that the form in which the Bill has been drawn is unnecessarily obscure. The best proof of that is that it has been understood differently by persons all of whom might have been considered capable of understanding a complicated problem. I am willing to undertake that when this Bill is dealt with elsewhere an attempt shall be made to give effect to the views that have been expressed by the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees—namely, that instead of having recourse to this power of adaptation we should re-enact mutatis mutandis the clauses in the other Act. I will also undertake that the two specific suggestions that have been made shall be considered—namely, that owners of building land whose land has been taken for the purpose shall have opportunities of exercising the right of resumption under conditions more advantageous to them than those afforded by the Bill as it now stands, and that adjoining owners who may be injuriously affected by the creation of these rifle ranges shall have some means of obtaining compensation. I trust we shall be able to meet the criticisms, which I readily admit are reasonable criticisms, on these points. I hope we shall be allowed to retain compulsory power of hiring in the Bill, because it is immensely important that rifle ranges should be provided, and it would be a great misfortune if it were in the power of some obstinate and unaccommodating person who owned a small fragment of the necessary land to upset the whole scheme.

THE EARL OF PORTSMOUTH thanked the Secretary of State for War for the undertaking he had given that when the Bill was dealt with in the House of Commons the suggestions he (Lord Portsmouth) and Lord Thring had expressed would be considered, and, if possible, given effect to.

LORD HERRIES: I do not think this Bill should be allowed to pass your Lordships' House in its present unsatisfactory form on the chance of its being amended in another place. Why not postpone the Third Reading and have the Bill amended before allowing it to pass?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): I would point out to the noble Lord that the Third Reading has been put and agreed to. The motion still pending is "That this Bill do pass."

LORD HERRIES: Then I object to the Bill passing, because it is in an unsatisfactory form.

On Question, agreed to; Bill passed and sent to the Commons.

SCIENCE AND ART DEPARTMENT—BUCKLAND MUSEUM.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: My Lords, I beg to ask the Lord President whether any arrangement has been made, or is in progress, for transferring the care of the Buckland Fish Museum to the Fishery Department of the Board of Trade, and for providing a permanent home for the museum: also why this museum, the bequest of which was accepted by the Science and Art Department in trust for exhibition, is now closed to the public, and when it will be reopened.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Duke of DEVONSHIRE): I am very sorry that the Board of Education, who have succeeded to the duties of the Science and Art Department, have been very much occupied recently in other matters, and have not been yet able to make any progress in the communications with the Board of Trade as to the future disposal of the Buckland Museum. I hope during the recess, if not sooner, to resume those communications, and of course I can assure my noble friend that in the meantime no step will be taken to carry out the recommendation of the Select Committee, which sat a year or two ago, in regard to the removal of this collection. The museum has been temporarily closed owing to the demolition and re-erection of some temporary buildings contiguous to the part of the gallery where the re-erection is to be made, and it became necessary to utilise the part of the gallery where the fish collection is housed during these operations. The museum has, I believe, again been opened to the public to-day.

INDIAN FAMINE—RELIEF MEASURES.

LORD SANDHURST: My Lords, I rise to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether, in view of the unprecedented severity of the famine and the great distress which must for some time continue after the bursting of the monsoon, the Government of India have in contemplation any extension of the system of relief beyond that laid down in the Famine Code.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: Before the noble Earl replies I should like to be allowed to say that any announcement on the part of the Government in the direction indicated in my noble friend's question will be greatly welcomed in the northern part of this kingdom, from which I come. As your Lordships are no doubt aware, there are a great many Scotsmen in India, and their friends in Scotland have received many private letters containing descriptions of the horrors of the famine more vivid than those published in the newspapers. The result is that in Scotland it is hoped, and even anticipated, that the Government may be contemplating some action beyond what has been already announced.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (The Earl of ONSLOW): My Lords, I am not sure that I apprehend rightly the exact nature of the aim of the noble Earl who spoke last, but I rather gathered that he referred to some kind of grant from the Imperial Exchequer to assist the Government of India. The statement has already been made to Parliament that Her Majesty's Government would come forward with assistance if they were satisfied that the resources of the Government of India were insufficient for the purpose. As far as we know at present those resources are sufficient for the great demands made upon them. Of course an enormous amount depends on the result of the monsoon which has just burst, and therefore it would be impossible for her Majesty's Government to give any promise or to foreshadow what their action might be until we know what is likely to be the condition of affairs during the coming rainy season. The Government of India have already far exceeded the prescriptions of the Code, which are elastic and not rigid, and have been adapted by the Government of India to the differing local requirements to the entire satisfaction of the local Governments concerned. For example, in the Central Provinces a very large number of kitchens have been opened, which will feed all comers during the rains, and the aged and infirm will be relieved at home. The able-bodied labourers will be given local employment by the village headmen at the cost of the State wherever private demand for fixed labour is slack. Sixty lakhs of land revenue have been suspended out of the eighty-six demanded. This sum, added to the twenty-seven lakhs special advances and the thirty lakhs of charitable relief, will, in the Chief Commissioner's opinion, secure active agriculture during the rains. Similar relief measures during the rains have been adopted elsewhere. In Bombay—the Presidency over which the noble Lord (Lord Sandhurst) presided with distinction in recent years—the Government are extending kitchens and gratuitous lists, and they are granting to the ryots advances for the subsistence of themselves and their labourers till next crop. They estimate twenty-five lakhs as the amount required for this, besides over sixty lakhs for seed and cattle. Of the Bombay land revenue only 192 lakhs out of 296 had been collected. In the Punjab the small farmers and labourers will receive subsistence allowances, and the revenue suspensions there are very large. The noble Lord asked me a question as to what are the estimates the Government of India have formed of the amount they will have to advance. These estimates, the earlier estimates, have been considerably increased. In the Budget arrangements fifty lakhs of rupees have been allocated, but the Government of India recognise that this sum is insufficient, and the requirements of the approaching season will be met by an additional 72½ lakhs; accordingly the grants will be increased to an aggregate total of Rx. 1,220,000. The Central Committee of the Indian Famine Fund have made grants aggregating (for British India alone) 50 lakhs of rupees. This is in addition to the provincial charitable relief funds already at the disposal of the local Governments. I hope the noble Lord will see that the suggestion thrown out that advances should be made with no niggardly hand has been adopted by the Government of India. No interest will be asked for them, no part of them will be repayable for a year, and the provincial Governments will have the utmost latitude to remit any portion of an advance they may think fit.

COLONIAL STOCK BILL [H.L.].

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: The object of this Bill is to enable, under the proper guarantee of the Treasury, that stocks of certain colonies to be brought within the category of those stocks in which trustees may invest under the Act of 1877, and I beg to move that it be read a second time.

Bill read 2ª (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House To-morrow.

House adjourned at five minutes past Seven clock, till To-morrow, half-past Ten o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 2nd July, 1900.

DUBLIN ELECTRIC LIGHTING BILL. (BY ORDER.)

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. CAREW (Dublin, College Green): After the very exhaustive discussion of this Bill last week, I do not intend to occupy the time of the House more than a few minutes to-day. It will be in the recollection of hon. Members that the consideration of the Bill was carried at the close of the last debate by the narrow majority of thirteen. Since that date a special Committee, presided over by the hon. Baronet the Member for Colne, which was appointed for the purpose of considering Bills promoted by electric syndicates in the north of England to supply electricity to different towns, have come to a decision which has a very important bearing on the question before the House at the present moment. They considered, that while granting power to these syndicates, it was their duty to safeguard the rights of local authorities by providing that, where a local authority shows its willingness to provide, on reasonable terms and within a reasonable time, a supply of electrical energy, it should not be subjected to the competition of a private company. That proviso represents what the Committee regard as proper in the case of English and Scotch communities. I wish to know why Irish communities should be treated in a different manner. At the present moment the Dublin Corporation has got over the financial difficulties which prevented it from giving to its citizens that supply of electricity which they desired. The strength of the opposition to this Bill lies in the fact that the corporation has not up to the present given satisfaction to the consumers. But it could not do so, because it had exhausted its borrowing powers upon a water scheme which has secured for Dublin the best water supply to be found in the United Kingdom. But last year it set its house in order. It has already spent £89,000 in establishing a generating system, and that proved a failure simply because the amount of money invested in it was too small. To meet that difficulty the Dublin Corporation have now obtained further borrowing powers, and it has arranged for an enlarged scheme by means of which, when it is in full working order, it will be able to give a supply of electricity which, it is hoped, will afford as much satisfaction to the citizens of Dublin as does the water supply at the present moment. The promoters of this Bill allege that the Dublin Corporation has already had sufficient time to make its supply a success. The reason it has been a failure, however, has been the inadequacy of its capital. That difficulty has now been got over, and I therefore ask the House to apply to Dublin the principle which its special Committee has laid down in regard to English and Scotch schemes, and to reverse the decisions already given in favour of this Bill. If this Bill is passed you will have competing systems in Dublin, which must give rise to friction, as the corporation is the sole road authority. It alone has the right to pull up the streets ; it has established a drainage and water system ; it has laid cables underground, and by means of the further borrowing powers it has obtained it will now be enabled to establish a full and complete system of electric supply. On the Second Reading of the Bill the hon. Member for one of the Divisions of Antrim, whose name is on the back of it, argued in support of it that the new company would be enabled to supply the light on the same terms as those on which it was supplied by many other companies—namely, 4d. per unit. But that argument does not now lie in his mouth, because the result of one clause which has been introduced will be that it will have to establish a scheme under which the light cannot be produced at a cost of less than 6d. per unit. I think the House would be taking a very serious step in departing from the principle laid down by its special Committee for safeguarding the rights of municipal authorities, and I therefore ask it to reject this Bill.

*Mr. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg leave to second the motion. This is a Bill to incorporate a company under the name of the Dublin Electric Light Company, with a share capital of £500,000 and borrowing powers to the extent of £160,000, and it empowers such company to construct works, to break up the streets, and to supply electricity within the city of Dublin in competition with the corporation. I have no desire to detain the House unnecessarily with details because we have quite recently had a long debate on this subject. But I wish to point out that there is a great principle underlying the opposition to this Bill—a principle well worthy the attention of the House. It seems to me rather strange that in a House of 351 Members the motion for the consideration of the report stage of this Bill was only carried by a majority of thirteen. I venture to say that such a small majority is unprecedented, because the tendency of this House has always been to support strongly the decisions of its Committees. It is admitted that this Bill is entirely without precedent, and I therefore contend that we are thoroughly justified in again asking this House to reconsider its decision. It has so far been carried against the wishes and opinion of the Members for Dublin, and I maintain that Dublin is entitled to the same treatment as would be accorded to an English or Scotch city. Although we were defeated by a small majority we now appeal to the House for equality of treatment, on a matter which is non-political, for the city which we represent, because such a measure could not be passed for any city in Great Britain. What has occurred since the last debate? A special Committee of this House, which has been sitting upstairs to deal with various Bills seeking electrical powers, has adopted a resolution in further confirmation of the principle that where a local authority shows its willingness to provide, on reasonable terms and within a reasonable time, a supply of electrical energy, it should not be competed with by private undertakers. If that principle is good for England and Scotland, why should it not also be applied for Ireland?

*Mr. BROWN (Shropshire, Wellington): The hon. Member has not read the whole of the resolution.

*Mr. FIELD: No ; I will leave that for the hon. Gentleman. I assert that if competition is not to be allowed by private individuals against municipal corporations in England and Scotland, the same principle should be applied to Ireland. In all English Electric Bills passed this session clauses have been inserted prohibiting the promoter supplying electricity in competition with the local authorities. Yet this Bill will allow such competition against the Dublin Corporation. This would establish through legislation a particular exception as against

Dublin, which is not to be in any way protected against competition in the supply of electricity, although clauses are inserted for the protection of Rathmines, Rathgar, Pembroke, and Clontarf. How is that to be justified? Assume, for the sake of argument, that the Dublin Corporation were now for the first time promoting a Bill with regard to the electric lighting of Dublin. What would be the position of the promoters of the Bill we are now discussing? They would not have even a locus standi in this House. They would have no power to oppose the Corporation Bill. But here, because the corporation have already been exercising powers for the supply of electricity, they are now to be subjected to the competition of a private syndicate. Could anything be more extraordinary? I submit that there are broader grounds underlying the opposition to this Bill. There is a great question of public policy involved. It will be generally admitted that that public policy in respect to electric lighting has been clearly laid down by the special Committee on Electric Lighting Bills, and by the House itself in the various Electric Lighting Acts which it has passed. That policy has been in effect to constitute the local authority as the proper party to undertake the duty of lighting within its own district. That being so, I respectfully affirm that the question of determining such a point of public policy should not be dealt with by a Select Committee. It should be left to the House itself, and that is why we are asking this House to reject this Bill. I quite admit that we are taking an unusual course, but then there are exceptional circumstances in this case, and I would suggest that no reflection whatever will be cast upon the Committee if its decision is reversed and the Bill now thrown out. This is the wrong time to pass such a Bill. The Corporation have obtained further borrowing powers which will enable them to carry into effect the plans of an eminent engineer for the proper supply of electric light. I also object in the strongest possible manner to public utilities being handed over to private companies, and I believe the House will vindicate the principle which has been laid down, that public utilities should be left in the hands of the ratepayers generally. Therefore, I am not in favour of the gas monopoly in Dublin, being as strongly opposed to it as are the promoters of this Bill, and I entirely object to permit a further extension of allowing a private syndicate to take over a source of revenue which should be devoted to the reduction of taxation. In English and Scotch cities taxation is being reduced because the municipal authorities have the ownership of the electric light, and it is obviously unfair to the city and citizens of Dublin, who are already so heavily burdened with taxation, that exceptional treatment should be accorded to that city, and that the revenue derivable from public utilities should find its way into shareholders' pockets, instead of going towards the reduction of the rates. In conclusion, I will read a summary of the objections of the corporation to this Bill. They are as follows:—

"1. There is no precedent for such a Bill. Such powers would never be granted in any English or Scotch town, against the local authority.

"2. The Corporation have been providing a partial supply, and within a very short time will have a supply of electricity for the entire city.

"3. All the streets of Dublin are already occupied by sewers, water mains, gas mains, and many streets by the underground feeder cables of the electrical tramways, by underground wires of the National Telephone Company, and postal telegraph wires, and the present Corporation electric light mains. When the Corporation system shall have been completed the opening of the streets by another lighting company would create an intolerable situation.

"4. Capital invested by a local authority under the provisions of an Act of Parliament should be able to claim from Parliament that protection which Parliament always affords to capital invested by statutory companies.

"5. The passing of this Bill would be in derogation of the powers for self-government so recently conferred on Irish municipalities, and the execution of the works thereunder would cause serious inconvenience and injury to the ratepayers of Dublin.

"6. It is idle to contend that this Bill is promoted in the interests of the citizens of Dublin. The Corporation are the representatives of the citizens, and the election of its members is entirely within the control of the citizens."

For those irresistible reasons I beg to second the rejection of this Bill, and I trust the House will throw it out by a substantial majority.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Carew.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*MR. BROWN said that, speaking on behalf of the Committee which passed the preamble of the Bill, he had to ask the House to support the decision to which it came after a very considerable amount of labour. The hon. Member who seconded the rejection of the Bill had referred to the resolution passed by the special Committee presided over by the hon. Baronet the Member for Colne. But he did not quote the full terms, which set forth that the local authority must be prepared to give a full and adequate supply of electric energy for all purposes, and that, in the event of disputes arising, the question should be submitted to the Board of Trade. The course pursued by the opponents of this Bill in thus renewing their opposition at successive stages and after the Bill had been carefully considered upstairs was most unusual. The Committee, after full inquiry, came to the conclusion that the Dublin Corporation had practically done nothing to carry out the powers it possessed in relation to electrical energy, and therefore an alternative company should be formed and authorised to give the city and some of the out-townships a supply of electric light. A great deal had been said about the difficulties with which the corporation had had to contend, but there was nothing in the evidence to lead him to believe that, if they had been in earnest, they could not have overcome such difficulties. He did not believe that any English corporation would have acted in a like manner. If the Committee had thrown the Bill out they would have given the Corporation of Dublin a monopoly which was not enjoyed by many corporations in England. The policy of Parliament, too, was against the creation of monopolies. As to the question of the roads, he might point out that if the Dublin streets had to be broken up for the service of the private company the corporation could do the work at the cost of the company, so that no conflict of authority would arise. They need not, therefore, fear any difficulty in that respect. Then again, it had been suggested that after a given period of years the corporation would have to buy up the system of the competing company. But that was optional and not compulsory, and if the corporation was giving a good supply he saw no reason whatever why it should have to buy out the company. Under these circumstances he hoped the House would confirm the decision of the Committee.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE (Antrim, N.): I think we have every cause to complain of the pertinacity with which this Bill has been assailed at every step and stage in its career. We had a division on the Second Reading, and those who, like myself, knew the merits of the case were not surprised to find that the Corporation of Dublin, backed and aided by the Freeman's Journal, did their best to burke all inquiry and to stifle all discussion with regard to the merits of the measure, and to prevent the Bill going before the Committee. On that occasion the House was satisfied that the Bill had sufficient merits to entitle it to go upstairs, and by a majority of twenty votes it was so decided. The Freeman's Journal and the corporation, however, watched the progress of the measure, and nothing could equal the disgust expressed by them when the Committee, after full consideration, found it was their duty to accept the Bill. It may interest the House to see the attitude taken up by this combination of the Freeman's Journal and the corporation. The hon. Member for the Elland Division of Yorkshire voted against sending the Bill upstairs, and it would seem to me that as he was to sit on an impartial Committee it would have been better if he had not voted on any issue in the House. In any event, he then voted against the corporation, and the Freeman's Journal attacked him as follows—

> "Mr. Trevelyan is supposed to be a Radical, but in this instance he appears to have developed a hostility worthy of Sir Henry Fowler to the Liberal principle of the municipalisation of monopolies. It is not a good beginning to a Liberal career."

That is the way the Freeman's Journal criticises the free action of Members of this House. It is part and parcel of the system of tyranny which is never lost sight of when that organ wishes to destroy anything in which the Unionists are interested, and in which the real well-being of the community is concerned. I protest against criticism like that being levelled against a member of a Committee who was simply doing his duty. Then

hon. Members were obliged to come over from Ireland to take part in a division on the Report stage. Again the House affirmed the principle and confirmed the decision of its Committee, and the Report stage was carried by a majority of thirteen. The Freeman's Journal then said they would change the scene of operations to the other House; but they have altered their mind, and although no circumstance has changed, we are now asked to reverse the decision of the House on the Second Reading, the decision of the Committee upstairs, and the decision of the House on the Report stage, and we are asked to do this without even any suggestion of any change of circumstances since the Bill was last considered. Interested as Members from Ireland are in having the procedure with regard to Irish Bills facilitated and cheapened, we have a right to complain of the way in which this Bill has been attacked and obstructed at every step. I should like to answer one question put by the hon. Member opposite. He asked what would be the effect of this Bill passing. The effect would be to relieve the people of Dublin from a most grinding monopoly. How has this power in the hands of the corporation been exercised? The Central Hotel in Dublin put up a gas engine because they could not get the power for electricity from the corporation. They had permission from the corporation to make a subway under the street to other parts of their premises. The instant the corporation found that these people were going to run a wire along the subway to supply power generated by this gas engine, the permission for the subway was withdrawn. Irish Members will recognise the name of Todd and Burns, a leading drapery firm in Dublin. They are obliged to supply their electric light with their own engine because it is impossible to get it from the corporation. But when they wished to connect their premises on the other side of the street the corporation immediately threatened to take proceedings against them before the magistrates. In every way the corporation have exercised their powers in the most tyrannical manner, and the desire is to get the traders of Dublin under their thumb in order to dictate the terms upon which they shall have their electric light. It is because of these things the promoters of this Bill have found it necessary to come before the House to ask that the decision of its own Committee should be affirmed, and the Bill passed into law. It really is very amusing to see the course the corporation have adopted. Last year, when the corporation were interested in another Bill, a number of Members of this House were taken across the Channel to see the beauties of Ireland, and they were told that the only view in Ireland as to that particular Bill was in its favour. This year again, with the same purpose—there is no secret about it—the Association of Municipal Corporations were invited; they were entertained in a similar way by the Lord Mayor, and it was endeavoured to pledge them to support this Bill. There is an amusing scene reported in the Irish Times of the Lord Mayor and the hon. Member for South Islington sitting after the dinner at the Mansion House. The Lord Mayor says, "The light is very good to-night," and the hon. Member for South Islington, being obliged to praise the light the same as he would have to praise his host's wine if asked a similar question, said it was remarkably good; whereupon the Lord Mayor said there was no necessity for any Bill whatsoever. I think this red-herring business of trying to capture the Association of Municipal Corporations will, under the circumstances, fail. The association seems to have added a new maxim to the constitution—that corporations can do no wrong; but in the present case the Dublin Corporation have had this power since 1891, but have done nothing except spend £90,000, and the people of Dublin are still left without the means of having their houses lighted with electricity, which is one of the commonest facilities in every English town. Under these circumstances I cordially support the Third Reading of the Bill.

MR. HARRINGTON (Dublin, Harbour): I do not think the hon. Member opposite has paid a very high compliment to the House of Commons in the speech he has made. The whole of that speech was formed around a few expressions which, in his judgment, would excite and animate the hostility of this House against the Corporation of the City of Dublin. Time after time reference was made to the Unionists of Dublin. But this is a question which has nothing whatever to do with matters of politics. If you set up a scheme in competition to the corporation, not only will you injure the Nationalist, but also the Unionist ratepayers of the city. I am surprised, too, at the attitude taken up by the hon. Member who presided over the Committee. It was his duty to defend the decision of his Committee when the Bill came to be reported to the House, but the moment he had done that I conceive his duty as chairman ceased; and to make such a speech as his on the Third Reading is to take a distinctly partisan attitude. But I do not think he has impressed hon. Members with his knowledge of how municipalities should be treated, or convinced the House that the Committee over which he presided gave a Bill of this importance that fair consideration to which it was entitled. What is the position of the citizens of Dublin? For the past eight or nine years there has been a partial scheme of electric lighting carried on by the corporation. It was an experiment; it was only a partial scheme. The only feeling of dissatisfaction in the city was that the scheme was not a complete and thorough one extending to the whole of the city. But the corporation was not in a position to extend the scheme to the whole of the city, their means were limited; their borrowing powers were restricted; they had to wait to see whether the system they tried was a success, and they had also to wait until they could get additional borrowing powers. Last year those additional borrowing powers were obtained, and the corporation are now able to go on with the work. The very moment they got those powers they applied to the Local Government Board for money to carry out an extensive scheme of electric lighting. Practically the syndicate promoting this Bill appeared before the inquiry held by the Local Government Board, and gave evidence against the scheme; but, notwithstanding that, the Local Government Board approved of the loan to the corporation. The citizens of Dublin would not object to two rival companies competing with one another in supplying the electric light, but it is a wholly different thing when the citizens have to pay out of their own pocket for any loss occasioned to them by competition with the company. The position with which they are now presented is that they will probably have to invest the money of the ratepayers to buy out the syndicates. There is no provision in the Bill to prevent this. If the corporation goes on with its undertaking simultaneously with the company it will not be a success, and the company have only to give as much trouble as will compel the corporation to buy them out. Would any other city in the Empire be treated in the same way? The hon. Member for North Antrim knows that no other city would be treated in that way by this House. I do not wish to dwell very long upon this question, but I think the hon. Member will admit that there are very few corporations in the United Kingdom that have done as much during the last twenty years to develop their city as the Dublin Corporation.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE: I admit there are very few like it.

MR. HARRINGTON: At all events, what I contend is that you have no right to set up in the city of Dublin what you would not set up anywhere else. The Corporation of Dublin had to come to this House to extend the municipality to the various townships around the city. They endeavoured to establish gas works, but they were absolutely refused the powers, and the only way in which they could enter into competition with the gas company was by means of the electric light. Now it is proposed by this Bill to put the corporation in competition with a new electric lighting company, but it is only a competition against the ratepayers themselves, and on one side or the other they will have to pay. If the company go on with their scheme the ratepayers will have to buy them out eventually, and if the corporation proceed with their own scheme in competition with the company it may not be remunerative. I hope the House will not treat the citizens of Dublin as they have not treated the citizens of any other city in the Empire.

*THE SECRETARY OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): I am a citizen of Dublin, and a considerable ratepayer, and in that capacity I desire to say a few words to the House upon this Bill. I cannot conceive how it is possible for the hon. Member for North Antrim to introduce politics into this question. How does the Freeman's Journal come into a case of this kind? How does he manage to shoot in the question of the Lord Mayor's salary? How do all those things come into a Bill which ought to be discussed calmly and on its merits? I beg of the House not to be turned aside from doing what I think fair justice to the citizens of Dublin by any political red herring which might be drawn across their track. I speak solely as a citizen of Dublin. I have been asked over and over again how it came about that the Corporation of Dublin, with the powers they have had under the provisions of the Act of Parliament, have neglected their duty in regard to electric lighting, and how it came about that they had failed to give a proper supply. I think anyone who knows the city of Dublin can give a reason for that which will satisfy the House of Commons. It has been said that the borrowing powers of the corporation were exhausted, and therefore they had not the capital. There is more in that statement than the House sees at first sight, for the Dublin Corporation with its limited borrowing powers had to choose between a great scheme of main drainage, affecting the health of the citizens; between spending money on artisans' dwellings or clearing insanitary areas, and the giving of the electric light to a certain number of people. The Dublin Corporation may be all that the Member for North Antrim has stated, but I think the Dublin Corporation has exercised a wise discretion in deciding to purify the main drainage of the city, and build homes for the poor, rather than supply electric light. It is not for the reason which has been put forward that they had failed, but because the corporation had to choose between things which they deemed to be more pressing and more urgent than even the supplying of electric light. How does the question stand now? The Dublin Corporation went to the Local Government Board and asked for an increase of their borrowing powers, and that is quite a common thing for English corporations to do. The Dublin Corporation were charged with a great sum of money borrowed for the waterworks some forty years ago, but they have now been relieved from that charge. They have just got a loan of £275,000 sanctioned by the Local Government Board. Hitherto the corporation have been unable to proceed for lack of funds which have been spent in another way. They have now managed to get released from charges which they could not avoid; they have the money and they have got the scheme sanctioned; and now this company proposes to come in to do the same work and enter into competition with them. Dublin is a poor city and it requires all the relief of the rates which can be given to it. It already makes a handsome revenue out of water, and I think it can also make a revenue and relieve the rates out of the electric light. That is, I think, a fair ground for the corporation to object to this Bill. In view of these facts, and altogether apart from politics—for politics ought never to have been introduced—I think a fair case has been made for the Dublin Corporation. Dublin is not an ideal corporation, and is capable of improvement but I will say—and I speak with a knowledge of many local authorities in England—that I know of no corporation in England or Scotland which is contending against greater difficulties than the Dublin Corporation. It is a very poor city, and therefore anything which will relieve the rates is a very grave consideration for the city. Besides I wholly object two or three years hence, if these gentlemen get their way, to spend the rates of the city in buying them out, for that is really what it amounts to. I beg of the House to mete out to the Dublin Corporation the same treatment it would mete out to any English borough, and if hon. Members will only do that I am not afraid of the issue.

MR. HALDANE (Haddingtonshire) said the case against the Corporation of Dublin was very much more doubtful than people would be led to suppose by just listening to the debate. In proposals of this kind he felt that it was absolutely impossible for them to get at the truth, and he did not think they were assisted even by the fact that they had had a speech from the Chairman of the Select Committee. It was said by the Member for the Harbour Division that the functions of the Chairman should be confined to what the House had relegated to the Committee, which was the question purely of the commercial and other merits of a particular proposal. But in the House they had to deal with general principles, and it had been a puzzle to him more than once to know what broad line they could lay down for their guidance in these matters. They had a debate in the House not long ago when there was a question of electric powers before the House, and they then got some light on the subject. He was not opposed to giving powers to private firms and individuals, because the supplying of electricity upon a large scale for commercial purposes was not like supplying gas or water; that was a matter which concerned the individual, but electric lighting fell in another category. The House had already laid it down as a principle that where a corporation was able to fulfil the duty of supplying the electric light—and this corporation claimed to fulfil that duty—any private company should be prevented from interfering. That principle gave a broad line of guidance to the House, and unless they adhered to it they would fall into chaos. He was very glad that the hon. Member opposite had made those remarks, because it gave them some idea as to what the views of the Government were.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I said that I was not speaking for the Government, but I spoke only in the capacity of a citizen of Dublin.

MR. HALDANE hoped that the President of the Board of Trade would give them the benefit of his great experience in dealing with private Bills, and if he did so he thought the right hon. Gentleman would tell them that it was better to adhere to the general principle laid down. Upon the broad principle that this Bill had nothing to do with municipal trading he was going to vote against this Bill, for it was contrary to the practice of the House, and he felt that they would be getting themselves into difficulties on future occasions, if they did not stick to the rule which had been laid down. If the House were dealing with an application from Edinburgh or from Birmingham, and the views of those places had been made so clear as they had been in the case of Dublin, he had no doubt on which side Members would cast their votes.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): The hon. Gentleman opposite has applied to me in regard to the general principle according to which the Board of Trade act in such cases as this. I have no hesitation in saying that the general principle upon which we act is that where a corporation and a company applied for a Provisional Order we should certainly give the Order to the municipality and not to the company. That is the general principle, about which there is no dispute. But that is not quite on all fours with an application for a new supply, as in this case. I presume hon. Members opposite who oppose the measure will be prepared to admit that this would be carrying the principle a great deal too far. It is said that the Corporation of Dublin have grossly neglected the obligations cast upon them by the Act, and that is alleged as ground of opposition to the measure before the House. Under the circumstances the company were bound to proceed by means of a Bill instead of a Provisional Order. The argument in favour of the Bill is that the corporation have had electric lighting powers for eight years, and have neglected to fulfil their duty. My hon. friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board says there is a good excuse for the corporation not having fulfilled its duty, and the reason he states is that the corporation wanted the money for some other purposes. But they deliberately refrained from raising the money which was required to carry out what was their duty under the powers they had obtained. I confess that if it could be shown that the corporation could not during all those eight years have raised sufficient money to perform their duty both as a sanitary authority and as promoters of the electric light—if that could be shown, then there would be some grounds for the argument put forward by my hon. friend. But I cannot myself believe that the position of the Corporation of Dublin with regard to their powers was so feeble as to render it impossible for them to obtain the money required for the purpose of carrying out their powers under the Electric Lighting Act as well as to perform their ordinary duties as a municipal corporation. My hon. friend has spoken about drainage works, the erection of artisans' dwellings, and the clearing of insanitary areas carried out by the Corporation of Dublin. But such work has had to be performed by every sanitary authority in the kingdom, and if they did not do it they were neglecting their primary duty. The people of Dublin have complained of the way the corporation have managed electric lighting. [Cries of "No, no!"] Is it to be supposed that the people of Dublin are so stupid and wanting in common sense and knowledge of their own convenience as not to complain about not getting that supply of electric lighting which the corporation had undertaken, when the corporation were only supplying some 215 persons? Is it contended that that is a condition of things under which the citizens of Dublin had no right to complain? In discussing these matters we ought to consider them more from the point of view of the consumer. It is rather curious to remember what took place two years ago in regard to the Marylebone electric lighting scheme. There a company was already in existence, and the vestry applied for a Provisional Order to supply Marylebone with electricity. And what did the company say? The company said it was unfair to inflict upon them competition from a local authority, although they did not mind competition from another company. Now, in the case of Dublin, the boot is on the other leg. In Dublin the ratepayers say they cannot stand the competition of a private company. Although I do not speak upon this question as a member of the Government, yet, for my own part, I am prepared to support the Third Reading of this measure.

MR. HARRINGTON: Perhaps I may be allowed to correct a misapprehension. The Corporation of Dublin had not the power to borrow, to which the right hon. Gentleman has referred. Twice they promoted a Bill for power to allow them to borrow the amount of money which they had expended on their water supply, but their Bill was thrown out in the House of Commons, and it was only the year before last that they carried their measure.

*MR. RUTHERFORD (Lancashire, Darwen): Being a member of the Committee who sat on this Bill, I hope the House will bear with me for a very few minutes while I say a word or two on the merits of the Bill. The position is that the corporation of Dublin have already spent £90,000 upon electric lighting, and one of their own witnesses, Major Cardew, said that they ought to have made a profit with a full load. But the result was, instead of making a profit, they had made a loss of £2,800, which has to be provided by the ratepayers of Dublin for what?—to give an inefficient supply of electricity to 250 consumers. The Secretary to the Local Government Board has stated that this undertaking will be a profitable one, but if the Dublin Corporation cannot manage successfully electric lighting works with a capital of £90,000 how can we expect them to manage successfully an undertaking with a capital of £340,000? Besides it would not be right or fair to overcharge the consumer of electricity in order that the rates might be relieved. Why should Parliament give this monopoly to the corporation when the supply is both bad and dear? Without going further into this question, I hope the House will decide the matter upon its merits. One word in regard to the Municipal Corporations Association. When the Bill was before the House last Tuesday that association sent a circular round which may have influenced a considerable number of hon. Members, but, so far as my research of the records goes, this association has never discussed the evidence given before the Committee at all. I might call the attention of the House to a previous circular issued by this association in regard to electricity Bills, including this very Bill. I submit that is exactly what has taken place in Dublin. Well, I can only say that, after hearing the evidence, that is the decision the Committee arrived at; and even the member of the Committee who differed from us, admitted that the Dublin Corporation had not done what they might or ought to have done. I hope in the interests of the consumer and the development of electricity, the House will confirm the decision of the Committee and pass the Third Reading of this Bill. I have made a research into the records of this association, and I find that it is only a very short time since this question of electricity has come before them at all. But the association had issued a circular previously in regard to Bills before the House, including this very Bill. And what did they then say?—

> "It is submitted that in order to justify the granting of electrical powers to a private company in any town already supplied by the local authority, it ought to be clearly shown that they have failed in their duty, or are not doing their best to develop the undertaking, or are negligent of or indifferent to the wants of the town."

[HON. MEMBERS: No, no!] As one of the members of the Committee, I submit that that was the decision we arrived at; and even the member who differed from us admits that the Dublin Corporation had not done what they could. I do hope, in the interests of the consumer and the development of electricity, the House will pass the Third Reading of this Bill.

*MR. BLAKE (Longford, S.): It seems to me that the course of this debate and the narrowness of the former divisions furnish justification for those who feel strongly, as many of us do, that to pass this Bill would be a calamity to the city of Dublin, and a very great infringement of the rights of the corporation of Dublin to ask once more the judgment of the House upon it. It is well that we should find what the governing principle is which should animate us in considering this Bill. I affirm it to be the settled view of the House that with reference to those public utilities, powers to exercise and take charge of which have been granted by the general law to municipalities, these ought not to be interfered with. I do not say that there is a rule without exception; but the corporation ought to have the first chance at any rate, and a fair chance to discharge their duty. The President of the Board of Trade has pointed out that that is the rule of the Board of Trade with reference to competing applications. In all the Acts which have been passed lately there has been no case in which competition was allowed when the municipality came first, and that is a perfectly right principle to go upon. Those who talk of monopoly being an evil in the case of the Dublin Corporation suggest the very opposite to what I believe has been accepted as a very sound principle. A corporation monopoly is not an evil monopoly, of which an invidious use may be made. It differs from a private monopoly, which is a monopoly for private gain from the discharge of public duties. A monopoly with reference to public utilities granted to a corporation with a popular organisation, such as now exists in Dublin, where there is the popular control of a great city with a quarter of a million of inhabitants and 40,000 voters, is a monopoly of all for the benefit of all. It is not the monopoly of a few for their own private benefit at the expense of all. Where can you have the power of a more vigilant and effective control of the management than when the managers are elected by the ratepayers who gain or suffer? Where you have everything done in public, with the people on the spot watching over the affair, the position is very different from the control exercised by a board of directors of a private company. What is asked here? It is that the corporation should retain full municipal rights in respect to all that class of matters which involve interference with the arteries of the traffic of the city. It is of the greatest consequence that full consideration should be given to the question whether a scheme involves any interference with the streets, as, for example, drains, trams in more modern times, water, gas, and electricity. All these things involve more or less interference with the streets, and that interference would be doubled or trebled if power were given to private individuals or companies to deal with the streets. Moreover, it would render more difficult and remote that to which I look forward—namely, the creation of a great system of subways or conduits under the main streets for the enclosure of all the pipes, wires, cables, and so forth, the machinery of these public utilities, so as to prevent the constant breaking up of the streets. So there is a special reason why the corporation should have not merely the first chance, but the sole power over the streets, and why no additional power of interference with the streets should be given to a private company; otherwise we shall have the corporation breaking up one side of the street and the private company the other—to the inconvenience of the public and the constant interruption of the traffic. Again, if a private company obtains such powers it only means that inevitably at some future time the corporation will, in order to regain full control of their own streets, and their own functions, have to buy out the company at a greatly added expense. Therefore, I maintain that unless a case is made out for altogether exceptional treatment, the Corporation of the City of Dublin have a right to the opportunity of putting into force their full powers for the electric lighting of that city, unhampered by the powers proposed to be given by this Bill. Is there then any reason why you should not give to Dublin that which you give to many other smaller and less important towns? Dublin is the capital of Ireland; its corporation is very ancient; there are a quarter of a million inhabitants within its restricted limits, and 75,000 sleeping outside these limits; and the opinion of this House has been twice most emphatically expressed that these 75,000 ought to be enclosed within enlarged limits and merged in the electorate of the Corporation of that City of Dublin, which is now said to be incapable of managing its own electric lighting concerns. There is no case here for exceptional treatment An appeal was made by the hon. Member for North Antrim—which, I think, must have been heard with regret—to English and Scottish Unionists not to support the Corporation of the City of Dublin, but to vote for the Bill. I thought, if there was one thing more than another to which the Unionists, of whom the hon. Member claims to be one, had pledged themselves on hundreds of platforms here and in Scotland, it was that, although they would not grant political self-government to Ireland, they would give Ireland the fullest, freest municipal government—equal treatment, similar treatment, simultaneous treatment to that conceded to England. That was the pledge of the Unionists, and now these gentlemen call out for inequality of treatment, for a different treatment. [HON. MEMBERS: No, no!] The House will judge by what has been said, and will decide between the statements of the hon. Member below me, who was a member of the Corporation Committee, and those of the hon. Member for North Antrim. I say, then, that to act in the way proposed by this Bill would be contrary to the general practice, contrary to recent legislation, and to the manner of dealing with much smaller and less important municipalities. It would be an action, I think, unworthy of men who I am sure are honest Unionists, and who should be the last to do it in the special circumstances of this case. It is said, however, that the Corporation of the City of Dublin has shown its incapacity, and that it has been so incapable in the past that it ought to be pronounced impotent for all time to handle such a business as an electric lighting concern. We ought not, I submit, to be very assiduous to enter into the question of whether the corporation have acted well or wisely under their powers. It may be very difficult adequately to deal with that question. We must always remember that if Dublin has erred, it is Dublin that has suffered; if Dublin errs now it is Dublin that will suffer. I look for a future when electric power will be very generally employed, and the electric light put into many houses, and I believe it would be better to give cheap electric light and power, and spread their use than to keep up high prices and limit their use. We ought to do all we can to promote the adoption of the electric light. In Canada and America it is commonly employed in every town of any importance, but here its adoption has been slow and haphazard. The conduct of the whole business of the practical utilisation of electrical energy, especially in the development of electric lighting, is no great credit to the English nation, but rather one to be ashamed of. But I repeat that if Dublin goes wrong on that point of view it is Dublin which will suffer, and if Dublin Corporation keeps going wrong the citizens are well competent to make their representatives, who are yearly elected, do their duty. Dublin, at any rate, did not err by waiting a long time! It was one of the earliest corporations to take up electric lighting while yet in its infancy in this country! It established a small plant at the cost of £30,000—these are facts which I gathered as well as I could from the reports of the proceedings before the Committee. I do not understand it to be denied that the best system and the best materials which were then available were used and the system for some time was satisfactory in its working though the extent was small. It was increased from time to time, but not to the extent which it might have been increased, owing to the limitation of the corporation's borrowing powers. The hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Local Government Board has pointed out that other things were being done by the Corporation at the same time. But they had been engaged in creating the Vartry water works at a much earlier date, and the money which might have been used for this purpose was so absorbed. £700,000 was deducted from their borrowing powers, which £700,000, in the end, it was acknowledged by this House, ought not to have been deducted, so that difficulty was, but only last year, removed. In that state of the case the corporation, not being able to spend more, spent gradually up to the sum of £90,000, which was the limit to which they could go. Then as to the quality of the light. In the first instance there was no complaint as to the quality of the light, but after some years it turned out that the cables that had been used, which had been purchased from a firm of the highest reputation, and which were supposed to be the best that could be obtained, from some cause failed; there was something wrong with the rubber casing or something of that kind, and they failed more or less, and the light became unsatisfactory. The same thing happened with several boroughs here. A couple of years ago plans were adopted to make this good, and somewhat to extend the system and bring it up to date; that was done, but there has been some misapprehension as to the cost. It was said that some £30,000 that had been spent had been lost by means of these defective wires and cables, but that is not the fact. I find the cables cost between £4,000 and £5,000, and that £26,000 or £30,000 was taken and mainly used for the purpose of utilising the most scientific knowledge and most scientific machinery in order to bring the extension up to date in accordance with modern ideas. No blame can be put on the corporation for those defective wires. Of course, while the decay was going on and new work and reorganisation was in progress the disorganisation grew greater, and then it was that that item grew up to which the hon. Gentleman referred as a charge upon the rates of £2,800 a year—in reality, of £2,800 for one single year, 1899, at a time when the corporation was re-modelling the whole of the work, and the whole affair was in an impossible condition. But since the works have been re-modelled, confidence has been restored, and a considerable number of new subscribers have come in. As to the quantity of the supply it is totally inadequate. Nobody has said that it is sufficient to light the whole city, and the sufficient reason given for its being insufficient is that the corporation had not the funds to make it so, and that the want of lighting power is due to the want of borrowing power. It is also said that the price is too high, and that may be so, because where you have a small supply, you always do have a higher price than you would with a large supply, because the fixed charges do not rise proportionately with the increased demand. Therefore, you can supply a large number at a lower price per unit than you can a small number. And that is what Dublin wants to do, and is prepared to do, and that is what it is proposed by the promoters of this Bill to do. The hon. Member spoke of a charge upon the rates of £2,800; with regard to this I will give the House a few figures which I have drawn from the reports of the proceedings before the Committee. Since 1892 the Corporation has paid out of the profits, first of all the working expenses, then £1,000 which they have put aside for depreciation account, then over £10,000 for the interest on the construction loans, and over £10,000 more towards the sinking fund for redeeming the capital of the loans. So that over £20,000 has actually been paid out of the receipts in respect of matters which, in the case of a company with a share capital, would not have been chargeable, and thus a substantial dividend would have been realised. That is what the corporation has done apart from the rates. The rates paid during the whole eight years are less than £6,000, the whole of which, save £200, has gone in further payments to the sinking fund for the redemption of the loan. So that what the Dublin ratepayers have done is not to pay for the keeping of the works going even in the last year of disorganisation, but to pay £6,000 towards the redemption of the capital of the loans raised by the corporation for the purpose of creating the works, and Dublin is so much the better off for every penny spent in that way. I have touched upon these questions, but really what we have to deal with is a later and altogether a different situation, the situation which obtained and existed at the time this Bill was applied for. What was it? It was acknowledged that the situation as before was a temporary one and could not last. It was not contended that the corporation could continue with only 250 consumers and eighty lights. It did not think so itself. It had twice made efforts to obtain relief from the limitation of its borrowing powers, and it made a third effort in the year 1899, and the real question is how things moved in that year. In the anticipation of this relief, on the 29th of March, 1899, the corporation called in a consulting engineer who has since been made consulting engineer to the works, to prepare a scheme, and from that time onward negotiations went on, and a scheme was being elaborated. In the meantime the Bill for their relief was going through Parliament. On the 9th of August the Bill received the Royal Assent, containing a clause striking out the charge in respect to the borrowing powers of £700,000 by a charge on the waterworks. They were therefore free to act on their scheme upon a large scale in the month of September, and on 22nd September the agreement with the engineer was reported to Council. It was not until the month of November that notice was given of this Bill, so that the corporation, when they saw the prospect of obtaining these borrowing powers, had, even before the Bill passed, in the hope that it would pass, moved in this matter. Notice of this Bill, as I said, was given in November. What happened? The expenditure being about a quarter of a million, application was made to the Local Government Board to sanction the loan. There was the usual public inquiry and the loan was opposed; but it was sanctioned; and tenders were invited with the most satisfactory results. The proposed charge per unit on the average between public and private lighting is about 3½d., comparing favourably with the company's valuation. It is plain, therefore, that the moment the corporation had the funds—and even in anticipation of getting the funds—they took such steps as they could. They proceeded with due diligence, and they had their scheme in order long before this Bill came to Parliament. With regard to coal the generating station is at a convenient point, and the price of coal there will be as cheap as anywhere in Dublin, and there is no reason why the corporation's plan should not result in their producing electric light as cheaply and as satisfactorily as it would be produced by any public company. The people of Dublin want their own electricity. Their council ask for it, and their members speak for it in this House. Then why should their aspirations be set aside, and a company set up to do that which is pre-eminently the work of the corporation. Is it because Dublin was so much earlier in this matter than other cities here that she is to be treated as a defaulter now? The question of default has to be treated as at the time of the default; I show here that the question of default does not now arise. Here Dublin has got the money, and she is ready to go on; the problem was attacked, and the determination arrived at before there was any notice of this Bill. Is it to be said that that determination is to receive exceptional treatment? Is that the Unionist notion in England or Scotland? Is it because Dublin has too much of this work to do? The Dublin Corporation has only got the water, which it does well. It has not got the gas, and it has not got the trams. It has only got the water and, as it hopes, the electric light, which it is now in a position to undertake—that is all. I suggest it would be a fitting thing for this House to leave the corporation and the people of Dublin to deal with their own electric light, to let the Dublin people manage their own affairs according to their own desire. It is they who will gain by success, and it is they who will lose by failure. Let them take the risk, if they wish to take it, with a free hand and full responsibility. I believe you would do so if Dublin were in England or Scotland, and I hope you will do so even though Dublin be in Ireland.

*COLONEL HUGHES (Woolwich): The Local Government Board of Ireland, after an inquiry in which all interests were heard, lately granted powers to the Corporation of Dublin to borrow over a quarter of a million of money. That was done for the purpose of enabling the corporation to go on with their scheme. If we go against the decision of the Local Government Board in Ireland, we will admit of proceedings which are very adverse, if not entirely ruinous, to the Dublin Corporation. I admit that the corporation have been in default. They might have borrowed this money before, but whatever the fault previously to the powers for this loan being obtained, they had to prepare their plans and say how much money they would require when application was made for borrowing powers. That scheme was initiated before this Bill came before Parliament. The powers were granted to the Corporation of Dublin to enable them to go on. I am bound to say if the Corporation of the City of London were in the same position, and if they had received the sanction of Parliament to borrow enough money to go on with the scheme, I do not think this House would allow the City of London to be hampered in carrying out their views. I do not see, for my part, why the City of Dublin, which may have been dilatory in the past, should not have a fresh start. There has been no default since this loan was granted, and I see no reason to dispossess the corporation of their prior right to light their own city.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): It is stated that you are doing by this Bill what you would not do for any city in England or Scotland, but I repudiate that suggestion. I say that in my judgment the gravest injustice would be done to the ratepayers of Dublin generally unless this Bill is passed. Fancy an English city appealing to me as an Irishman under these conditions: "For ten years I have covered the ground, and by the Statute of 1882 I have been able to shut out all competition. I have expended in these ten years £100,000 of the ratepayers' money. How many of the ratepayers have I served of the quarter of a million people in my area? I have served exactly 250." What right would any English municipality have to come to me and say, "Now will you, as an Irish Member exercising your vote in this House, see that no competition with an authority of that kind is to be tolerated until the end of time?" That is the sole position, and I say for myself that if any English corporation from Manchester to Leeds, and from Leeds to Bradford, having had the expending of £100,000 of the citizens' money, and was only able to supply 250 people in the interval, made such a request I would freely vote to allow some competition to be introduced. My hon. friend the Member for North Longford has said, and said truly, that electric lighting is in a disgraceful position in the three kingdoms. Why? Because of this Act of 1882; because, instead of allowing competition and the free play of enterprise and capital, you said, "We will give it over solely and wholly into the hands of municipalities." That was the policy Parliament laid down in 1882. You had to correct it in 1888, and you had to make a further correction in 1890. We have to take up this position—should there be free trade in a matter of this kind, or should there not be free trade? That is the whole question. I want to know what satisfaction it is to me to pay sevenpence to the corporation. If they were John Smith, I would kick against it. What satisfaction is it to me that it is the ratepayers' money that is being spent? I want the electric light for twopence-halfpenny—I do not care whether it is from the corporation or anybody else. Then it is said, "Oh, if you grant this Bill you will have to provide £300,000 or £400,000 at some other time to buy out this company." The only places where sums of money have been given to electric lighting companies to buy them out were places where the corporations had no rights at all. The companies started, and the corporations bought them out after they had been put on a good footing, and it was well worth their while to do so. What is the case here? They have got their own rights and their own powers. We are told that they have got the means of carrying it out. Why do they not carry it out, and why should not the citizens get the benefit on the one hand of the action of the corporation, and on the other hand of the action of the promoters of this Bill? I want to know the necessity for buying anybody out. Give them a fair field and no favour. If it is in the interest of the corporation to buy them out let them do so. I do not see why a corporation, having spent £100,000, and prepared to spend £300,000, should be anxious to buy anybody out. The only other point I wish to allude to is this: we are told that the corporation have now got a new scheme, and that the old defects were owing to the fact that they started originally with no borrowing powers and with a small capital. I want to know, if I have any undertaking what business I have to get a monopoly if I have not the means of carrying that monopoly into effect efficiently. Why should the corporation begin such an undertaking upon a small capital? Would any merchant be listened to in such a case? Supposing I make nails or anything else, and I begin with a small capital, and I claim that you should not let anybody interfere with me. Would that be listened to for a moment? Why is what is regarded as absurd in the case of an individual to be sacred in the case of a corporation? Why did they begin with insufficient funds? Why did they throw away £100,000 of the ratepayers' money? If they threw away that sum, why should the corporation now be allowed to shut out anybody else who are prepared to do better what they have failed to do? Before the corporation's scheme can be carried into effect the permission of Pembroke township, through two miles of which the mains must run, must be got, and Pembroke township is fighting the corporation tooth and nail in the Committee of the House of Lords, and Pembroke will never give that permission.

MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): There is a clear understanding that Pembroke will withdraw its opposition.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I should like to know upon what grounds that clear understanding was given. Pembroke has been asked again and again to withdraw its opposition, and the solicitor for the Pembroke township said he would do his best in the matter. I have discovered that the same gentleman is also the solicitor for the Dublin Gas Company. I want to know also why is it that the most effective lobbyist—and I never knew a Bill to be lobbied as this has been—has been using his influence against this Bill? The statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite has been challenged by the Member for the Harbour Division as to the action of the corporation in regard to the Central Hotel. All I have to say about it is that I have received a communication from that company myself bearing out everything the hon. Gentleman opposite has said upon that subject. I do not think, however, that this question should be considered from that point of view at all. I think we have now arrived at much bigger issues. The question is whether this House will allow Free Trade to be established where there has been in the past a total failure on the part of municipalities to do their duty.

MR. DAVID MACIVER (Liverpool, Kirkdale): I desire to say a word in support of the hon. Gentleman opposite. The promoters of the Bill are the Dublin Corporation. I have lived through the history of a kindred enterprise—I refer to the tramways of Liverpool. Exactly what occurred there is, I believe, what will occur in this case, if this Bill is granted, and this company comes into the domain of the corporation. It will not be many years until, as in the case of the Liverpool tramways and the Birkenhead tramways, the corporation at considerable expenditure of the ratepayers' money have to buy out the private company then in possession. This company is not a company of philanthropists. They do not go there for the purpose of conferring some gift on the citizens of Dublin. I think they go there with the idea of making money for themselves when they have created a successful concern. It is merely on that ground that I wish to speak strongly in support of those hon. Members who are opposing the Bill. I cannot sit down without saying that, as a strong Unionist, whether this involves the question of Home Rule or not, we should look at this as one of the matters which principally, I would say almost entirely, concern the Corporation of Dublin. Can it be supposed for a moment that if Ireland had charge of her own local affairs Dublin would be treated differently from any city in England? For these reasons I intend to vote against this Bill and to give what support I can to the corporation.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—POSITION AT PEKING.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can give the House any information as to the legations at Peking, the composition and command of the relieving force, and its present position.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Admiral Bruce, telegraphing from Ta-ku, at 4 p.m., 30th June, states that he has heard from the German Admiral that a Chinese runner three days from Peking, who arrived at Tientsin, 29th June, brought despatches saying that all Europeans were in great distress, that the German Minister had been murdered by Chinese regular troops. The total allied force available is now about 13,000 men. As the troops have been rapidly arriving we do not yet know what arrangements may have been made locally for the command of an expedition, but it has not yet been thought possible to attempt a further advance.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Does the right hon. Gentleman say that the advance from Tientsin has not yet started?

*MR. BRODRICK: It has not been thought possible to attempt a further advance.

THE YANG-TSZE PROVINCES.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, with regard to the Yang-tsze Provinces, the Consuls have signed a declaration undertaking not to interfere so long as order is maintained by the Viceroys in those regions; and if so, whether this declaration has been ratified by the representatives of the Powers at Peking; and whether in view of the present state of affairs in China, he will state what steps are contemplated for the protection of British life and property in these provinces.

*MR. BRODRICK: The Consuls have been in communication with the Viceroys, who are quite aware that support will be given them by Her Majesty's Government in preserving order. It is obviously impossible that the representatives of the Powers at Peking should be consulted, as no communications are passing with them. The senior naval officer at Woosung has full discretion to act where necessary.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS—COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he will be able to inform the House as to the constitution and terms of reference of the proposed Committee which is to proceed to South Africa and inquire into the arrangements for treating the sick and wounded.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I do not think I can make any statement to-day. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will put down the question for Thursday.

NEGOTIATIONS PRECEDING THE WAR — THE FIVE YEARS FRANCHISE.

*MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state on what conditions President Kruger offered a five years franchise before the outbreak of the war to the Outlanders in the Transvaal; and whether he can also state what are the naturalisation qualifications and penalties in Austria, Russia, New South Wales, America, and England.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The conditions of President Kruger's offer are contained in the Parliamentary Paper, South Africa, 9521, page 44 and following pages. With regard to the second part of the question I think that the excursion into comparative jurisprudence which I am invited to make is somewhat outside my province.

*MR. FLAVIN: Is not the qualification in Austria ten years? If so, why go to war with Kruger on the franchise?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

ADMIRALTY TRANSPORT CONTRACTS.

MR. MOSS (Denbighshire, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he will supply to the House a list of all those companies, firms, or persons from whom the Admiralty have chartered steamers during the last twelve months, and also the names of all those firms or individuals who have acted as agents or managers for steamship owners in their negotiations with the Admiralty during the same period; and, whether he will consider the advisability of declining in the future to negotiate or enter into contracts with those steamship owners who carry on their negotiations with the Admiralty through Members of this House.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.): Column 5 of the Return No. 184, ordered by the House of Commons on 6th February last, giving particulars of vessels engaged for the conveyance of troops and horses for South Africa, which is now being printed, will show the names of the owners of all such vessels. I have no objection to furnishing the hon. Member with the names of the firms or individuals who have acted as agents or managers for the owners in their negotiations with the Admiralty. In regard to the last paragraph of the hon. Member's question it would not be in the public interest to exclude all steamship owners or companies who occasionally communicate with the Admiralty through their representatives who are Members of this House, thereby excluding some whose fleets have been invaluable to the nation.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): When will the Return be presented? It is six months old already.

MR. MACARTNEY: It is being printed. I should think it will be circulated very shortly.

KOORN SPRUIT DISASTER — ROODEVAAL ENGAGEMENT: LOSS OF THE DERBYSHIRES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, having regard to the announcement in the London Gazette of the conferring of the Victoria Cross on four soldiers for their conspicuous bravery during the action of Koorn Spruit, on 31st March, 1900, with particulars of the disposition of the troops on this field of battle, the War Office will now communicate to the public the details of the disaster at Koorn Spruit, and respecting the officer in charge of the convoy when the greater portion of the baggage column and five out of the six guns of the leading battery of the Royal Artillery were captured by falling into the ambush laid for them by the Boers.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): I will answer this and Question 43 in the name of the hon. Member.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: No, no! Take them separately.

Question 43 was as follows:—"To ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will explain why the account, now in the possession of the War Office, giving the details of the surrender of the 4th Battalion of the Derbyshire Regiment, has been withheld from publication.'

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am not prepared to anticipate by way of question and answer any exercise which the Secretary of State may see fit to make of his discretion to publish despatches and reports on military operations.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the War Office publish the name before the General Election?

[No answer was given.]

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I wished to put Question 43, but as the hon. Gentleman does not appear to be in his place I will put it to-morrow.

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS, Birmingham): The question has already been answered.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I object to its being answered in the way it was. I will repeat it to-morrow.

INOCULATION AGAINST TYPHOID—PURCHASES OF SERUM.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the medical expert at Netley Hospital who recommended the inoculation with so-called anti-typhoid serum of troops sent to South Africa has sold serum to the Government; if so, how many doses were purchased from him, and at what price; and, whether the doctor has pecuniarily profited by the sale of the serum.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No, Sir.

MR. J. A. PEASE: Was any serum sold by this individual to the Government?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am informed there was no sale or profit from the transaction.

ARMY COMMISSIONS GRANTED WITHOUT EXAMINATIONS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state how many commissions in the Army have been, since the commencement of the present war in South Africa, granted to gentlemen who have not passed any military examination, and on what principle of selection have these commissions without examination been granted, and can he say out of the total number of commissions thus granted how many have been given in the Royal Engineers, Royal Artillery, Household regiments, Cavalry, and regiments of the Line respectively.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The numbers of commissions granted without examination are as follow:—Engineers, nil; Artillery, 266; Cavalry, 139; Guards, 31; Infantry, 657; total, 1,093. Two commissions were offered to each battalion of Militia; the candidates were nominated by the commanding officers and recommended through the General Officer commanding. In the Volunteers a certain number were offered to each district, nominations resting with the General Officer commanding. A certain number were offered to the Universities, the nominations resting with the University authorities. Commissions were offered to various colonies, the nominations being placed in the hands of Governors in consultation with the Imperial Officers commanding the Colonial forces. Some were placed at the disposal of Lord Roberts. Promotions from the ranks to commissions were also made, some being recommended by Lord Roberts.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Can the hon. Gentleman say approximately how many promotions there have been from the ranks?

*MR. WYNDHAM: We have not got the total number of promotions from the ranks. Fifty commissions were specially allotted to Lord Roberts in addition to any promotions he might recommend for distinguished services on the field. We have not yet got his recommendations.

NATIVE LABOUR IN RHODESIA.

MR. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government has received from the British South Africa Company proposals for the further regulation of native labour in Rhodesia, and will he state whether the subject is now under his consideration; and whether any Reports have been received from the Resident Commissioner in Rhodesia as to the condition and treatment of natives under the British South Africa Company's administration; and, if so, whether they will be communicated to the House.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The British South Africa Company have informed me that the administration of Southern Rhodesia is not yet in a position to submit its proposals. In December last I requested the High Commissioner to instruct Sir M. Clarke to furnish a report upon the recruiting of labour for the mines, but I have not yet received it, owing, no doubt, to the pressure of military questions and the difficulties of communication.

RED CROSS SOCIETIES—PRUSSIAN KNIGHTS OF ST. JOHN.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if the attention of the War Office was called, in connection with the arrangements made with the Red Cross Society in 1898, which appear to have been continued in the present war, to the organisation of the Prussian Knights of St. John, and the nature of the co-operation and division of duties between them and the Prussian Military authorities in time of war; and whether the Secretary of State for War will move the Foreign Office to call upon Her Majesty's Ambassador at Berlin for a Report upon the subject.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir, the attention of the War Office was called to this subject by the report of the British delegate to an International Conference of Red Cross Societies held at Vienna in 1897, and the present organisation is based on that report. The Secretary of State will act upon the suggestion made in the second paragraph of the question.

ARMY ORDNANCE CORPS—TERMS OF RE-ENLISTMENT.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether his attention has been directed to the cases of Privates Taylor and White, of the Army Ordnance Corps, who, having served seven years in the Army and five years in the Reserve, had completed their Army engagements, and obtained this year, on re-enlisting into the Royal Reserve, the usual bounty of £12, and have since taken on to complete the service of twenty-one years with the colours; whether he is aware that these men, on re-enlisting for the purpose of serving out the full term of twenty-one years, are now under orders to China, and have been apprised that the £12 bounty which they received will be deducted from their pay; whether, as the former practice under which a man who served five or seven years with the colours and then went into the Reserve could not return to the colours for the purpose of serving out his time so as to be entitled to a pension unless he repaid his deferred pay has been for some time abrogated, he can say on what ground it has been rescinded without notice to the men affected by the alteration; and whether, having regard to the circumstances of the case, it will be provided that Reservists on re-enlistment will not be liable to refund the sums paid to them as bounty.

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: The bounty of £12 was specially attached to the engagement for one year's service at home. Men re-enlisting for service at home and abroad to complete twenty-one years' service will have the advantage of a pension at the end of their term. The Secretary of State for War does not consider that such men are entitled to retain the bounty; but the refund is diminished by a deduction of £1 for each month which they have served since their re-enlistment for home service.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Did these men know that the bounty would be taken from them?

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: Yes, that was one of the terms of re-enlistment. One of the conditions of re-enlistment for home or foreign service is that the bounty should be refunded.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the hon. Gentleman see that in the future the War Office clearly notifies that in such cases the money will have to be repaid?

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: I think the notice is perfectly clear. I will, however, look into it, and if it is not sufficiently clear I will see that it is made quite clear.

RESERVE OFFICERS' OUTFIT ALLOWANCE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War

Office will he explain why, when all officers of the Reserve rejoining under Paragraph 488, Clause C, of the Royal Pay Warrant (whether ordered on active service or otherwise), have been granted an outfit allowance of £100 to cover the expense of providing themselves with the necessary uniform, exception has alone been made in the case of officers of the Royal Army Medical Corps, and will he say whether the word officer, used in Part I. of the Royal Warrant, includes medical as well as officers of any other corps.

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: Outfit allowance will he granted in these cases.

MILITIA COMMISSIONS — EXAMINATION.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will explain on what ground the examination of Militia officers for commissions in the Army, which it was announced several months previously would be held last March, was cancelled about a fortnight before the appointed time, and may the announcement that a Militia examination for commissions in the Army will be held next September be regarded as definite; and will he say whether the War Office authorities will be prepared to give definite information as to the holding of this examination, having regard to the fact that parents sent their sons at some expense to army tutors to prepare for an examination which was announced to take place in March last and was not held, and to prevent the impression that the examination announced for next September will not be held, and that commissions will be obtained without examination.

The following question on the same subject also appeared on the Paper:—

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is now in a position to state whether Militia candidates doing duty with their embodied battalions will be forced to pass a competitive examination in September; and, if so, in what subjects they will be examined.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Perhaps my hon. and gallant friend the Member for the South-east Division of Essex will allow me to reply to his question at the same time. The competitive examination announced for last March was not held because the number of candidates who entered their names was less than the number of commissions offered for competition.

MAJOR RASCH: As the hon. Gentleman has not answered the last paragraph of my question, I will put it again to-morrow.

MILITIA OFFICERS' ALLOWANCES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether, seeing that the taking away of the 4s. per diem messing allowance of Militia officers, formerly allowed them during their annual training, and the substitution of a sum of £100 bounty at the expiration of the period of embodiment, entails expense on married officers (who are compelled during the embodiment of the regiments to keep up two establishments—the mess at the station where they are quartered and a home for their wives and families) a messing allowance can be granted to those officers who are married, in addition to the embodiment bounty.

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: The Secretary of State for War is unable to make a distinction between the married and unmarried officer in the direction suggested in the question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the Secretary of State consider the propriety of reverting to the old system, seeing that these gentlemen are suffering a great hardship?

*MR. J. POWELL-WILLIAMS: The Secretary of State has already fully considered the matter.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Then it is a case of very bad judgment.

CHELSEA HOSPITAL.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state in general terms the qualifications required for election to the Chelsea Hospital, and what is the amount of the pension per diem bestowed upon those who are elected; and whether the pensioners are given any of the tobacco confiscated by Her Majesty's Custom House officers; and, if not, whether there is any reason for denying them a share in a luxury that costs the country nothing.

*MR. WYNDHAM.: In-pensioners are selected from permanent out-pensioners of excellent character, who have been rendered incapable, through wounds or injuries resulting from Army service, or through other causes, provided they are over fifty-five years of age, or who are required for employment in the hospital. The men are paid according to rank, but on admission they receive, as a rule, 1d. a day, supplemented by 1d. a day out of the private revenues of the hospital; their out-pension ceases. Tobacco is provided out of the private revenues derived from the Drouly legacy. The grant of confiscated tobacco is confined to cases in which the purchase of tobacco would otherwise be defrayed out of moneys voted by Parliament.

AUSTRALIAN COMMONWEALTH BILL —SUPREME JUDICIAL TRIBUNAL FOR THE EMPIRE.

MR. LYTTELTON (Warwick and Leamington): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has any information respecting the views of the Australian Governments as to additional judicial appointments in connection with the passing of the Federation Bill.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I informed the House at the end of the Committee stage of the Commonwealth Bill, in reply to a question from the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs, that I was in communication with the Australian colonies through the Australian delegates as to their wishes in regard to the proposed appointment of four additional law Lords, pending the consideration of the question of establishing a Supreme Court for the whole Empire. The delegates had given me to understand that the proposed measure should not be proceeded with, and that Her Majesty's Government should as soon as possible in consultation with the colonies, consider the larger question of a representative supreme tribunal for the whole of Her Majesty's dominions. The delegates placed themselves in communication with the Colonial Premiers in regard to the matter, and I have now received the following telegrams—

"From Governor Earl Beauchamp.
"Dated 26th June, 1900.

"Additional Colonial judicial positions. Prime Minister of New South Wales has been in communication with other colonies for some time. New South Wales, Victoria, South Australia, and Queensland prefer to wait passing permanent comprehensive measure. No reply received from Tasmania and Western Australia."

"From Earl Beauchamp.
"Dated 29th June, 1900.

"Referring to my telegram of 26th June, additional judicial positions, my Ministers advise that Tasmania and Western Australia prefer permanent scheme."

In those circumstances, of course, Her Majesty's Government will not proceed with the Bill which they intended to bring in for the purpose of providing four additional Judges; but they will take the earliest opportunity of consulting with the colonies—including, of course, Canada and New Zealand—with regard to the establishment of a permanent Court.

TOBACCO DUTY—ABANDONMENT OF THE BUDGET PROPOSAL.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that a deputation, comprising the largest manufacturers in the tobacco trade in Great Britain and Ireland, waited on the Chairman of Inland Revenue to protest against the abandonment of the Budget proposal to limit the use of oil in the manufacture to 3 per cent.; whether he is aware that honest makers, employing only as little oil as necessity demands, are injured by the character and style of their goods being imitated by a product in which as much as 18 per cent. of oil is introduced as an adulterant; and as this practice injures the manufacturer and causes a loss to the revenue to the extent of 6d. to 7d. per pound, would he, if he received an assurance that such a measure would not be objected to, consent to reintroduce this session the safeguards which he originally proposed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): My attention has been called to the circumstances referred to by the hon. Member, and although the figures given by him are those of an extreme and, I hope, quite an exceptional case, yet the matter is one of undoubted importance to the interests alike of the revenue, of the consumers of tobacco, and of the tobacco trade. I proposed a clause to deal with the matter while the Finance Act of this year was passing through the House, but did not press it, as objection was taken on the ground of insufficient notice to the trade. If I received such an assurance as the hon. and learned Member suggests I should be glad to renew the proposal this session; but, in default of such an assurance, I feel myself bound by the pledge of the Leader of the House against proceeding with any fresh opposed business this year.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Will the right hon. Gentleman postpone the Bill to enable us to ascertain if there is any really substantial objection?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I will consider that.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES —ADMINISTRATION OF THE ACT.

MR. DRAGE (Derby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, having regard to the fact that under the Acts with regard to the housing of the working classes as they now stand no debate on the administration of the Acts can now take place on the Estimates of the Local Government Board, except on the narrow question of audit, whether, as the Bill now before the House as amended in Committee renders it doubtful whether such discussion is possible on the Estimates, he will insert on the Report stage provisions under which it may be possible for the administration of these Acts to be discussed annually on the Estimates of the Local Government Board.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Even if the proposal of my hon. friend were necessary or practicable for the purpose he has in view, I should not be in order in moving clauses on the subject without notice; but I am not aware that there is anything in the Bill to render it doubtful whether a discussion on the administration of the Housing of the Working Classes Acts is possible on the Estimates of the Local Government Board. That, however, is, I think, a matter for the Chairman of Committees to decide.

LIQUOR LICENCES—BELGRAVE HOTEL, LIVERPOOL.

MR. SAMUEL SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been drawn to the circumstances attending the transfer of a liquor licence in Liverpool on 21st June, in which the magistrates granted a licence to certain premises known as the Belgrave Hotel, situate in Bryanston Road, St. Michael's, by way of transfer from premises in Renshaw Street, two miles away; whether he is aware that the applicant admitted that he took the latter premises two months before, solely for the purpose of obtaining a transfer to the Belgrave Hotel; and that a licence for this house had been refused year after year for many years, owing to the opposition of the inhabitants of the neighbourhood; and seeing that on the same occasion the owners of the premises known as the Belgrave Hotel offered to surrender six licences which they held, on condition that a transfer licence was granted to those premises, and actually did so on the licence being granted, whether he proposes to take any action in the matter.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): I have made inquiry into this case, and find that the facts are correctly stated by the hon. Member. The course taken by the magistrates appears to be within their discretion, with which I have no power to interfere; and I can take no action in the matter.

WEST SUSSEX POLICE RESERVE SCHEME.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he has received an application from the Standing Joint Committee of the Administrative County of West Sussex for his approval of a scheme for establishing a reserve class of superintendents, sergeants, and constables, consisting of men who, having completed their statutory period of service, are entitled to retire on a pension under the provisions of the Police Act, 1890, but who are willing to continue in the force if, in so doing, they incur no risk of forfeiting the pensions to which they are entitled for any causes other than those specified in Section 8 of the Police Act; if he is aware of the difficulty which at present exists in finding suitable candidates for police forces, and of the desirability of retaining men of good character and of the requisite physical qualifications, who are familiar with the work of police officers, and who are willing to continue their service beyond the statutory period of retirement; and whether, seeing that the desirability of forming a similar class of reserve constables has frequently been brought to his notice, he will state the reason why he has not hitherto seen his way to give his approval to the scheme submitted by the Standing Joint Committee after full consideration of the requirements of the administrative county, and of the best means of meeting them.

*Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY: I see considerable difficulty in the proposal to create such a reserve class as appears to be contemplated. I am, however, in sympathy with the general object of the proposal, but I think that, in order to carry out any such scheme, some modification of the provisions of the Police Act would be desirable, and this I am not prepared at present to introduce.

MANCHESTER TELEGRAPHISTS—"SUPERIOR DUTIES."

Mr. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, although the Tweedmouth Committee decided that telegraphists performing superior duties for nine months should have duty pay, in order to avoid this concession at Manchester properly qualified senior men have been removed from superior duties and placed under junior officers; and whether the Postmaster General will state whether the rule issued in that town, to the effect that no officer must act in a class above his own sufficiently long enough to claim duty pay, is issued with his knowledge and approval.

The FINANCIAL SECRETARY to the TREASURY (Mr. Hanbury, Preston): It has been the practice at Manchester so to arrange that the performance by substitutes of the superior duties shall not be unduly prolonged in individual cases. This is done with the view of giving as many officers as possible the opportunity of qualifying, or showing their fitness for promotion. There is no such rule in force at Manchester, or elsewhere, as that indicated in the last paragraph of the hon. Member's question; and as matter of fact the allowance for the superior duties has been paid in some cases. There are at the present moment two officers at Manchester who are drawing it.

POST OFFICE SICK REGULATIONS.

Mr. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if the promised rules, regarding temporary transfer to seaside and country offices of officers recovering from serious illness, have been drawn up, and if such transfers will now be allowed.

Mr. HANBURY: As I explained on the 2nd March, 1899, the practice is limited to the following cases:—(1) Officers who have broken down or are in danger of breaking down from overtime performed either compulsorily or in response to a call for volunteers. (2) Cases among such officers of actual or impending illness which can be certified as being due to causes specifically attributable to the nature of the officers' duties.

DUTIES IN ALDGATE AND E.D. POST OFFICES.

Mr. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the fact that members of the staff employed at the Aldgate and Eastern District post offices who are engaged upon counter work perform 10 a.m. to 8 p.m., noon to 10 p.m., and 3 p.m. to 11 p.m. duties, and in each case without relief for tea; whether, although a Parliamentary Return, published in 1898, stated that relief was given on the latter duty, the counter clerks are obliged to perform their duties whilst having their meals; and whether the Postmaster General will consent to allow relief to be given to all clerks performing more than eight hours duty.

Mr. HANBURY: It is the case that, in consequence of great pressure of duty at the offices named, no regular period of relief for tea is just now being afforded to the counter staff; but it is recognised that this should be provided for in the case of the officers whose attendance is being prolonged to ten hours; and arrangements for the purpose are under consideration. The circumstances do not, in the Postmaster General's opinion, call for an extension of the existing rules touching meal reliefs, but in special cases additional facilities are afforded as far as possible.

SCOTTISH SALMON FISHERIES—BLACKSHAW BANK.

MR. SOUTTAR (Dumfriesshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that five police officers of the county of Dumfries—namely, two inspectors, one sergeant, and two constables—were engaged for three days on the Blackshaw Bank, in the county of Dumfries, in measuring the white fish nets of the fishermen residing in the parish of Carlaverock, and in measuring the sandbanks on which the nets are placed, and in generally surveying the Blackshaw Bank for the purpose of giving evidence on behalf of the owners of the salmon fishings in the district of the river Nith in a civil action of declarator against them by the said fishermen; and that two constables have recently been stationed at Glencaple for the sole purpose of getting up evidence on behalf of the owners of salmon fishings in said action; and whether he will take the necessary steps to put a stop to the salmon owners being allowed to get the services of the police in a civil action with which the police have no concern.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I am informed that the two constables referred to performed the actual work of measurement, and are now stationed at Glencaple for the purpose of inspecting the nets on the direct request of the District Fishery Board, with a view to the preparation of a report to the Board. These two men are not ordinary constables, but are "additional" constables, employed by the police authority at the expense of the District Fishery Boards within the county under an agreement of long standing made in terms of Section 22 of the Salmon Fisheries Act, 1862, which gives specific power to district boards to "agree with the police committee of any county for the purpose of paying additional constables for the better protection of the fisheries in their district." So far, therefore, as these men are concerned, the proceedings seem to have been perfectly regular. The two constables were accompanied by the senior officer of their respective divisions, and by a sergeant with local knowledge, these three officers being ordinary members of the police force. The Secretary for Scotland has frequently expressed his disapproval of the police being engaged in other than proper police duties. In the present case he has asked for the observations of the Standing Joint Committee on the practice to which his attention has been directed.

GREENOCK RATE COLLECTION.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the action of the rate collector of Greenock in refusing to receive the poor rate unless the school rate was paid at the same time, is according to the usual practice; and, if not, will he have the matter looked into.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I am informed by the Local Government Board for Scotland that the collector accepts payment of the poor rate although unaccompanied by the school rate during the ordinary progress of his collection but that, acting upon the opinion of his law agent, when a warrant is obtained and handed to an officer to be put into execution, the collector requires the payment of both rates. The Board consider that in so acting he follows a proper course.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: But is it legal?

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I shall be happy to look into that point, and will then give my opinion.

CLONES POST OFFICE.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if the intention of the Department to erect a post office at Clones has been abandoned; and, if not, can he explain the reason why the work is not proceeded with; and can he say has the same decision been taken in the case of Monaghan; and, if not, why have no steps been taken to rebuild the post office there.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General has not abandoned his intention to provide new post offices at Clones and Monaghan as soon as suitable schemes can be put forward. At Clones a site in The Diamond is now under consideration. At Monaghan a site in Church Square is under consideration.

CASTLEBAR POST OFFICE.

DR. ROBERT AMBROSE (Mayo, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, what progress has been made with regard to the erection of a post office in Castlebar, county Mayo, the site for which has been purchased a considerable time.

MR. HANBURY: A site for a new Post Office at Castlebar has not yet been purchased, but a proposal for the acquisition of a site and the erection of a building has just been received at the Treasury.

DERRY CENTRAL RAILWAY.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that the Belfast and Northern Counties Railway Company has given notice that they will not continue the working agreement with the Derry Central Railway Company expiring in February next; will he state whether the Belfast and Northern Counties Railway Company have opened negotiations with the Treasury to procure to themselves a forced sale of the Derry Central line on foot of the mortgage debt due to the Treasury by the Derry Central Railway Company; is he aware that such a sale, if carried out, would tend to destroy competition in the district; and that complaints have been made of the Derry Central Railway Company; and that there is a feeling in the districts served against the management of the Derry Central line by the Belfast and Northern Counties Railway Company under their working agreement; will the Treasury give reasonable opportunities to enable the Derry Central Railway Company to arrange with other companies for the working of their line when the agreement expires, and not exercise the power of sale; and will he, in accordance with the policy announced by him in 1895, give a pledge that no sale of this line to the Belfast and Northern Counties Railway Company shall be carried out without full notice and free competition.

MR. HANBURY: The statements in the first two paragraphs are substantially correct. But the Belfast and Northern Counties Company, while refusing to continue the working of the line for another year on existing terms, have not refused altogether to continue it. I have given the Derry Central Company an opportunity of making a counter-offer, and I shall be glad to consider any offer from other quarters. I am aware of the local feeling against the present arrangement. I am considering how far it would apply to the working of the line by the Belfast and Northern Counties Company as part of their own system, and whether effective competition can be expected in this district under any arrangement.

CORK AND WATERFORD TELEPHONE SERVICE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether continual delays are caused in the use of the trunk telephone between Cork and Waterford, owing to its passing through Dublin; and whether it is proposed that this arrangement for telephonic communication viâ Dublin is to be a permanent one.

MR. HANBURY: A return of the trunk wire messages between Cork and Waterford for the months of May and June shows that the average time occupied from the receipt of the calls at the post offices until the subscribers were put into communication with one another was slightly less than ten minutes. The number of messages was less than one a day, and the provision of a direct line between the two places does not appear to be justified at present. In the two months the actual number of messages in both directions was thirty, and the average time occupied 9·9 minutes.

LISTOWEL TELEGRAPHIC SERVICE.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that inconvenience and loss of time and money is caused owing to the fact that telegrams cannot be sent direct from Tralee to Listowel, a distance of only twenty miles, but have to be sent viâ Mallow, Cork, and Limerick, a distance of about 200 miles; and whether, in view of the dissatisfaction caused by the present circuitous route, steps will be taken to provide direct communication between Listowel and Tralee.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is not aware that inconvenience and loss of time and money have been caused through the present mode of transmission of telegrams between Tralee and Listowel, but he will have inquiry made and will see whether any improvement can be effected.

DUBLIN POST OFFICE—FEMALE CLERKS.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether female clerks in the Post Office, Dublin, forfeit £10 a year in salary on being transferred from London, their hours and duties being equal with their colleagues there; whether men clerks are subject to any similar deduction; and whether he can explain the reason for this exceptional treatment of Irish female clerks.

MR. HANBURY: The maximum of the Dublin scale is £10 less than the maximum of the London scale; and women clerks who are transferred (at their own request) from London to Dublin and are in receipt of pay in excess of the Dublin maximum sustain a loss to the extent of such excess. Men clerks would be treated in the same way under similar circumstances.

IRISH POOR LAW HOSPITALS—INSPECTION.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that union general hospitals and union fever hospitals in Ireland are inspected and reported upon by lay inspectors, and can he state what qualifications these gentlemen possess for the discharge of this duty; is he aware that the Irish Workhouse Reform Association and the Irish Medical Association strongly recommended that those hospitals should be inspected by professional men; and will he see that effect is given to those recommendations.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The inspection of workhouses in Ireland, as in England, is under the general inspectors, who report on the state of the buildings, the cleanliness, order, discipline, the keeping of the books, the finance, and the compliance with the general regulations by the several officers in every department, including the hospital wards. It would not be practicable to exclude these wards from the general inspectors' authority, but when any questions as to medical treatment arise, or where any inquiry has to be held wherein medical knowledge is required, a medical inspector makes a special inspection or holds any inquiry on oath that may be necessary. The question of assigning this work to a special medical inspector appointed for the purpose is under consideration.

COUNTY MONAGHAN WORKHOUSES.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the County Council of Monaghan recently passed a resolution in favour of the amalgamation of workhouses; and whether he will direct the Local Government Board to hold an inquiry in the county of Monaghan with a view of ascertaining what workhouses might be closed there.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The resolution referred to has been received. The Local Government Board are in communication with the county council on the subject.

FAIR RENTS IN COUNTY CORK.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a numbe of applications to have fair rents fixed i the Bantry and Castletown Berehaven unions have been postponed one year and a half ago in order that the revising officers of these unions may revise the valuations; and what is the cause of the delay in connection with them.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: In twenty-five cases from the Union of Castletown-Bere applications to fix fair rents were adjourned in January last, as it appeared that in each of them there was no separate tenement valuation for the lands which were the subject of the fair rent proceedings. In these cases a revision of the valuation was necessary to enable the Court to comply with the provisions of Section 55 of the Local Government Act of 1898. The necessary revision will be made by the Commissioner of Valuation during the present year. There are no cases of this kind now pending in the Bantry district.

ORANGE CELEBRATIONS AT DOWNPATRICK.

*Mr. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received a letter from the Deputy District Master of the Orangemen of Lecale, residing in Downpatrick, repudiating the statement that it has been the ordinary practice to prevent the Orangemen walking through Irish Street; whether he is aware that they have been in the habit of going through Irish Street, Downpatrick, every 12th of July, and that on Pretoria Day the street was decorated with loyal flags and illuminated; and will he explain why the demonstration, which was composed of loyalists of all classes, was prohibited by the police from manifesting their joy at the success of the British arms in South Africa.

Mr. G. W. BALFOUR: The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. Apart from the statement of the Deputy District Master, the information before me is to the effect that the Orangemen have not been in the habit of marching through Irish Street every 12th July. Last year, it is true, they did so, but this was the only occasion for a number of years past on which they passed through the thoroughfare. Irish Street was partially decorated on the 5th June. I need hardly say there is no foundation whatever for the statement in the last paragraph.

Mr. FLAVIN: When did the Irish people adopt Pretoria Day as a national holiday? Is there any authority for it?

*Mr. SPEAKER: Order, order!

IRISH CONSTABULARY AT HOLYHEAD.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether two members of the Royal Irish Constabulary are stationed at Holyhead; and, if so, with what object; and, will he state what they are paid, and whether the cost of maintaining them at Holyhead is thrown upon Ireland.

Mr. G. W. BALFOUR: Only one member of the constabulary is stationed at Holyhead. He is engaged on ordinary police and detective duty, which includes the arrest of absconding criminals, the detention of stolen property, and the various other duties incidental to an important port in constant communication with Ireland. His pay and allowances, which are at the usual rate, are paid from the Constabulary Vote.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Are any British policemen stationed in Ireland and paid for out of the Irish funds?

Mr. G. W. BALFOUR: I do not see how that could be.

R. I. C.—RECRUITING FOR SOUTH AFRICAN SERVICE.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Royal Irish Constabulary recruits are being raised and trained for police service in South Africa; and, if so, out of what fund is the cost taken.

Mr. G. W. BALFOUR: The answer to this question is in the negative.

Mr. PATRICK O'BRIEN: And do I understand they will not be so trained?

Mr. G. W. BALFOUR: Yes.

RELIGIOUS SERVICES AT ARKLOW.

Mr. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been called to the action of the Rev. Mr. Hallowes in insisting upon conducting a Protestant service close to a public meeting in Arklow on Sunday, the 24th of June; whether he is aware that the rev. gentleman had been warned beforehand that his action would be likely to cause a breach of the peace, and that he was permitted by the inspector in charge to carry on his proceedings at the police barrack while the meeting was being held, to the annoyance of the public and to the Catholic members of the force; and whether the Irish Government will take steps to protect the people of Arklow from such practices of the Rev. Mr. Hallowes.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: My attention has been directed to the proceedings at Arklow on Sunday, the 24th June. The rev. gentleman had previously been requested by the police not to sing or preach while passing the meeting referred to. Notwithstanding this, however, he did march through the streets and close up to the meeting, his followers singing the while. A breach of the peace being imminent, the police moved him and his party, for their own safety, to the barrack square, in which they continued to carry on their service free from interference and where neither the public nor the police were affected by it. The police had a difficult duty to discharge on the occasion, and they discharged it with tact and efficiency.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what was the character of the meeting?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It was called during the time divine service is usually held.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: Have Catholic clergymen ever disturbed Protestant meetings in this disreputable manner?

IRISH TEACHERS' RESULT FEES.

MR. GILHOOLY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state what is the amount of the deficit in the results for the year 1899 in District 58; and what effect such deficit will have on the future income of this district.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This question will be brought before the Commissioners at their meeting to-morrow. Perhaps the hon. Member will repeat it on Thursday.

NATIONAL TEACHERS IN WORKHOUSE SCHOOLS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether in the changes proposed to be introduced in the methods by which national teachers are paid any provision will be made for national teachers in workhouse schools; whether he is aware that many boards of guardians have hitherto made to their teachers a payment corresponding to the results fees in ordinary schools, and that the National Board of Education has assisted the guardians to establish this method of payment by requiring their inspectors to report on the answering of the individual pupils in the workhouse schools in the same manner as in ordinary schools; and whether, as this will in future be no part of the duties of the inspectors, and it will therefore not be possible for the guardians to continue to pay results fees, some provision will be made to prevent the workhouse teachers suffering loss by the proposed change.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This matter has already been considered by the Local Government Board on a resolution passed by the board of guardians of Limerick Union proposing that the teachers of workhouse schools who have hitherto been paid results fees from the rates should be given increments to their annual salaries to compensate them for any loss arising from the abolition of the results system. The Local Government Board informed the guardians that they do not consider that a fixed increment to the salaries of the teachers in workhouse schools should be made by the board of guardians in lieu of the results fees hitherto given from the rates upon the certificate of the Board of National Education, but that they would be prepared to consent to a bonus equal to the average of the past three years results fees being given to the teachers after each examination if the report of the inspector upon the school was in every respect satisfactory.

RATHKEALE QUARTER SESSIONS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to the action tried at quarter sessions in Rathkeale, on 15th June, in which Laurence Hartnett sued Head Constable Hyland, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, for false arrest and imprisonment, and obtained a verdict of £20 damages; whether he is aware that the learned county court judge in charging the jury commented on the conduct of the head constable in dragging the plaintiff out of bed, handcuffing him, and marching him off to prison, although there was no evidence against him; and whether it is proposed that the costs of this action and the damages in which this head constable has been mulcted be paid out of the public funds, or that the head constable be recouped from the public funds for these costs and damages.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The facts are as stated in the first and second paragraphs, except that it is not true that the judge stated there was no evidence against the plaintiff. I may observe, however, that the judge has since written to the Inspector General stating "that although the defendant may have been technically wrong he acted absolutely right in the interests of justice and order. He arrested one who he had full reason to believe had committed an outrageous Whiteboy crime in a rather disturbed district. I would most earnestly recommend and pray that the State will see this first-class officer harmless from all pecuniary loss and otherwise." The head constable, having lodged an appeal to the assizes, the question referred to in the last paragraph will not be considered until the case has been disposed of.

IRISH LAND COMMISSION AS MEDIATORS.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Irish Land Commission on being applied to by a former tenant to act as mediators under Section 47 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, the usual statutory notice of such application having been served by the said Commission upon the landlord, and he having failed to give notice within the prescribed time of his objection to such application, have power to extend the time allowed for lodging such objection; and whether the landlord, being prevented by disability from lodging his objection, it is competent for another person to do so on his behalf.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is not possible to answer this question upon the information given; if, however, the hon. Member will furnish me with the names of the parties to the proceedings mentioned I will endeavour to have the case identified.

IMPRISONMENT OF SYLVESTER DWYER.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a man named Sylvester Dwyer is at present undergoing a sentence of eighteen years in Maryborough Prison; whether he can state for how long Sylvester Dwyer has been in prison; and whether, in view of the feeling that exists in Dwyer's innocence and of his long imprisonment, steps will be taken for his release.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The case of this convict was considered by the Lords Justices so recently as the 18th June, when it was decided that the law should take its course. He will have completed thirteen years of his sentence on the 14th instant, and will be eligible for release in the ordinary course in January of next year.

MR. FLAVIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say why the law did not take its course in the case of Lord Kenmare's bailiff, who only did eighteen months out of twenty years?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury for information as to the course of business, and especially as to the class of Estimates that will be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As regards to-morrow, we begin Committee on the Tithes Bill, and I imagine that will not be concluded the same evening. On Friday I propose to take the Scotch Estimates which I had intended to take last Friday.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): When will the Vote for the House of Lords Offices be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can give no pledge as to that.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorkshire, W.R., Shipley): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state when the Admiralty Vote for Propelling Machinery will be taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot give a definite answer at present, but I hope to be able to take the Vote on Friday week.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state approximately when the remaining Irish Estimates will be taken, and whether the new rules of the Board of Primary Education in Ireland will be published before the Irish Education Vote is taken; and whether he can see his way to arrange that the Second Reading of the Irish Primary Education Bill and the Irish Intermediate Education Bill will be taken during the same week as the Irish Estimates.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that the suggestion of the hon. Member will be acted upon, and the rules will be published in a separate Paper, which I trust will be in the hands of hon. Members before the Education Vote is taken. As regards the second paragraph, I will endeavour to meet the convenience of the hon. Members, but I am not at present in a position to give an absolute pledge.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: Can the right hon. Gentleman say approximately when the new rules will be laid on the Table?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Very soon, I hope, but they are not yet in their final form.

MR. JOHN REDMOND: They ought to be in the hands of hon. Members some few days before the Vote is taken.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the fact that the Central Chamber of Agriculture have called a special meeting of the council to consider the amended form of the Agricultural Holdings Bill, he will defer the Report stage of the Bill until the House has the advantage of any further suggestions from the chambers.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR was understood to reply that this was not possible.

PUBLIC WORKS LOANS BILL.

"To grant money for the purpose of certain local loans out of the Local Loans Fund, and for other purposes relating to local loans," presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time to-morrow, and to be printed. [Bill 280.]

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACT (1890) AMENDMENT BILL.

As amended, considered.

*MR. SPEAKER: The first Amendment in the name of the hon. Member for South Islington is out of order. Th

Bill is a Bill to amend Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, but he proposes to amend the whole Act and also to alter the incidence of taxation, which cannot be done at this stage.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I beg to move the new clause which stands in my name, and I do so with the object introducing into this Bill some means by which it may be possible to obtain enforcement of the provisions of the Act in many rural districts where it is now neglected. In drawing up the Amendment I have carefully followed the wording of the Act of 1890, although I have introduced some slight modification in the last portion of the clause, so as to give to the medical officer and ratepayers, under certain circumstances, power to call the attention of the central authority to the neglect to put the Act in force. I think this is necessary, because, as the right hon. Gentleman has shown us on more than one occasion, although very large powers exist, there is no provision whatever to secure their enforcement, and they are indeed seldom if ever put in force in many districts where we have a scandalous condition of housing in existence. Bad housing is consequently allowed to go on to the detriment of the health of the locality and of the morals of the people. If this Bill is to become operative, if it is to have greater force than the Act of 1890, we must strengthen it in some way and give someone the power of drawing the attention of the local authorities to their default in carrying out the intentions of the Legislature. I believe that in a question like this affecting the public health no more suitable officer could be found to undertake this duty than the medical officer of health, and although in many rural districts such an officer holds his position on a very insecure tenure, and is only too often paid a comparatively small salary for the performance of very responsible duties, I am sure the House will feel that he is the proper official to discharge this task. I am quite aware that while the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill may be willing to accept the first and second portions of my clause, he may object to the third, on the ground that it brings in the interference of the Local Government Board. In order to meet that objection I would suggest that the enforcing authority should be the county council, and I have no objection whatever to the county council being substituted for the Local Government Board in the third portion of this clause, so that the provision will then run that, upon representations made by not less than four householders to the medical officer of health for the district to the effect that the conditions of housing then existing are dangerous to the public health, the medical officer shall inspect and report, and the county council shall take steps to see that the Act is put in force in the event of the necessary action not being taken by the local authority. I believe that some such provision would make the Act more efficient. I do not think we can too strongly deplore the impotence of the Act of 1890, seeing that in most rural districts it has had no effect whatever in improving the housing of the agricultural poor. It is in order to ensure that the local authority in such districts shall do its duty that I propose this clause, and I repeat that I think the county council may wisely and properly be introduced as the enforcing authority.

New clause—

"(1) It shall be the duty of the medical officer of health of every rural sanitary district to represent to the local authority of that district any parish or other area within that district where danger arises to the health of the inhabitants of such parish or area from the insufficiency or unwholesomeness of the existing supply of lodging-houses for the working classes.

"(2) If in any rural sanitary district any four or more householders living in or near to any parish or other area in such district complain in writing to the medical officer of health of that district that danger arises to the health of the inhabitants of such parish or area, or of such district, from the insufficiency or unwholesomeness of the existing supply of lodging-houses for the working classes in such parish or area, he shall forthwith inspect the same, and transmit to the local authority the said complaint and his opinion thereon; and, if he is of opinion that danger does arise as aforesaid, shall represent such parish or area to the local authority; but the absence of any such complaint shall not excuse him from the duty of making a representation under Subsection 1 of this section where necessary.

"(3) If within three months after receiving the said complaint and opinion or representation of the medical officer, the local authority declines or neglects to take any proceedings to put this part of the Act in force, the householders who signed such complaint may petition the Local Government Board for an inquiry, and the said Board, after causing an inquiry to be held, may order the local authority to proceed under this part of this Act, and such order shall be binding on the local authority."—(Sir Walter Foster.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The clause of my hon. friend is divided into three parts, and as to the first two I have, as he has said, no objection whatever, although, in my opinion, it is altogether unnecessary, for I am advised, and indeed I am satisfied, that, with one exception, everything proposed to be done in those two paragraphs of the clause can be done under the existing law. The hon. Member gave, as I think, a somewhat curious reason for this clause. He said that the local authorities had undoubtedly got very great and extensive powers already, but they do not use them, and therefore he would give them more power. I do not quite follow him in that.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: No; I said I would give the medical officer of health and the ratepayers more power.

MR. CHAPLIN: I certainly thought the hon. Member said he would give the local authorities more power. With regard to the position of the medical officer of health, that is a question to which I undoubtedly attach very great importance. But I do not think you would improve his position by the insertion of this clause, and the Committee will have to consider very carefully the fact that he must be placed in a very different position altogether from that which he now occupies if you mean him to be a really efficient official with regard to the housing of the working classes. Everything suggested in the clause can be done under the existing law, with one exception, and that is where the medical officer of health is called upon to report on the insufficiency of lodging-houses for the working classes; and even as regards such insufficiency, if it be shown to arise either from the unwholesomeness or overcrowding of dwellings, then it is his duty at present to report. But if there is an insufficiency of houses as apart from overcrowding, that, I submit, is not a matter for the medical officer of health, who would not be the most appropriate authority to deal with it. The third section of the proposed clause states that under certain circumstances the Local Government Board should be brought in to coerce the recalcitrant local authorities.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I said I was prepared to substitute the county councils.

MR. CHAPLIN: I have considered the clause very carefully, and I have come to the conclusion that if pressure of this kind is to be brought to bear it would be better that it should be brought to bear by the county councils rather than by the Local Government Board. The county councils are representative bodies, with local knowledge which the Local Government Board cannot possess in the same degree. What I propose to do, therefore, is not to accept the proposal of the hon. Member, but to accept with some Amendments the clause of the noble Lord the Member for the Cricklade Division, as was suggested to me the other night by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton. I think, with some Amendments, that clause would very satisfactorily answer the purpose in view.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. SPEAKER: The next two clauses standing in the name of the hon. Member for South Shields are not in order. They are both outside the scope of the present Bill.

MR. STEADMAN (Stepney): In rising to move the clause which stands in my name, I hope the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government will give it a little more consideration than he did last week, when he described it as a harum-scarum proposal. I am not a lawyer, but I give way to no Member of this House in my desire to see better accommodation for the working classes of this country. If the right hon. Gentleman had really any sympathy with the question or a desire to do something in the right direction he would, instead of ridiculing my humble clause, avail himself of the assistance placed at his disposal, which I have not at mine, to draft it into proper shape. I consider this clause one of the most important that has so far been moved in connection with this Bill, because it touches the very root of the evil under which the working classes are now suffering, and that is the question of the land. It is all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to say that the county councils and other local authorities have already got this power and that power, and that they are now to be given power to enable them to purchase land outside their own areas, but after all it is the landowner we have got to deal with. He is the most important person to consider, and we have not taken into consideration at all what he requires for his land. The London County Council have purchased six sites under Part III. of the Act at a total cost of £96,000. Two of these sites, including the Millbank site, which was Government property, and therefore paid no rates at all, cost the Council £37,500. The largest site purchased, Totterdown Fields, Tooting, with an area of 38½ acres, cost £45,000, and it is proposed to house something like 12,000 persons on it. That site is agricultural land, and if it were purchased at its agricultural value the price, instead of working out at over £1,100 per acre, would work out at about £40. It paid rates on its agricultural value, but immediately the London County Council proceeded to purchase it the owner would not sell it at that value, but required its full market value for building purposes. The result is that the Council had to pay an enormous price for this land, which, I maintain, should have been purchased on its assessable value as agricultural land, and not upon its value for building purposes, for which it was not assessed at all. I know this Amendment touches the vital system of the taxation of ground values. Vacant land at present has no assessment, and, therefore, pays no taxation. In some of the improvement schemes carried out by the London County Council a part of the site had to be left vacant, because it was too small for the Council to build on owing to the restrictions imposed by the Local Government Board and the Home Office. It is impossible for a municipality to build on a small plot of land even if it only desires to cover expenses and not to make a profit. I am anxious to see municipalities build houses for the working classes without loss to the ratepayers. The rateable value of these sites now vacant would be £2,683 per annum, if buildings were placed upon them, and the total cost to the London County Council, because they were kept vacant, was £5,378 up to the 31st March, 1899. If all vacant land was assessed, and paid rates upon its full market value, it would have the effect of bringing into the market a large amount of land suitable for building purposes. If used as agricultural land it would be taxed upon the basis of its market value, not for agricultural, but for building purposes. Therefore it would be no longer to the interest of the landlord to hold it back as he does at the present time. We are paying as ground rent to-day a hundred times as much as the agricultural value of the site, as the value of the land, especially in the city, or the near vicinity of the city, is increased through the industry of the people, and not from any merit of the landlord himself. The more the people by their industry increase the value of his land the more the landlord makes the local authority pay for it. Now, in fixing twenty-five years purchase as a basis, I think I have acted very fairly even to the landlords. I was for over twelve months chairman of the Investments Committee of the Hearts of Oak Society, and on many occasions we could invest our money in ground rents at as low as eighteen years purchase. I admit that the value has gone up since that time, but that has been through the industry of the people. It is a well-known fact that if the vacant land is allowed to go unassessed and paying no rates the landlord is encouraged to hold the land vacant until the time arrives when he can get the highest price for it. The Government might bring in a dozen Bills, but no Bill will solve this problem in a satisfactory manner unless the Government are prepared to deal with the owners of the vacant land, and compel them to sell it at a fair market value to municipalities for the erection of improved houses for the working classes.

New clause—

"For the purposes of Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, a local authority may acquire vacant land compulsorily at a price equal to twenty-five years purchase of the annual value as assessed for taxation."—(Mr. Steadman.)

—brought up and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

MR. CHAPLIN: I am sure I am very sorry if anything I said in the course of the debate the other day was at all distasteful to my hon. friend. I think I would like to withdraw the expression "harum-scarum clause," I then used, and substitute for it "the most unworkmanlike clause I ever saw in my life." I really cannot say very much more to-day than on the previous occasion about this clause. At the present moment, under a Provisional Order, confirmed by Parliament, the price of the land is fixed by arbitration if there has been no previous agreement. I do not quite understand what really the desire is of the hon. Member. In one breath he says that all he wants is that the land should be sold at a fair market value. That means what the arbitrators would decide is the price to be paid for it. But in the next breath the hon. Member goes a good deal further. He assumes the rôle of general arbitrator, and decides that, in the purchase of land, no matter of what kind, or where situated, and utterly regardless of all the surrounding circumstances, he would never give more than twenty-five years purchase of the assessable value, whatever he means by that—and I do not propose to inquire. The hon. Member says that this is to apply to vacant land, by which he means land not built upon. Let us see what his proposal may involve. It may inflict the greatest possible hardship. Take the case of a hard-working, industrious man, who perhaps has sprung from nothing, and by his industry has made a fortune which he has invested in land near a town, or perhaps just beyond the boundary. That land is vacant because it is not built upon, and he has given fifty years purchase for it, exactly its fair market value. Now comes the occasion when, under the clause in this Bill which enables local authorities to go beyond their boundaries to acquire land for the purpose of housing the working classes, this man's land is to be purchased by the local authority. The hon. Member will not leave the value of that land to be fixed by an arbitrator. It is to be laid down by Act of Parliament that under no circumstances is the owner to get more than twenty-five years purchase for what he has paid fifty years purchase. I am quite certain that the hon. Member will see, when he looks at it in this way, that the clause will not hold water. I desire as much as anyone the cheapening of land for this great national purpose; but is it right or fair or just to penalise one particular class for that purpose, and throw upon them the heaviest part of the burden, because they happen to be owners of the vacant land? It seems to me that the clause cannot bear argument for a single moment.

Question put, and negatived.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): The new clause I rise to move is one which the right hon. Gentleman has said he is willing to accept for the reasons he has stated. I should like to thank the right hon. Gentleman for the very courteous manner in which he has met the views of those on this side of the House who are anxious to see this Amendment adopted in one form or another. I am very glad that the new clause meets the views of my right hon. friend who was President of the Local Government Board in the last Government. The clause has been modelled, as far as possible, on Clause 16 of the Local Government Act of 1893–4. I have accepted a valuable Amendment suggested to me by the President of the Local Government Board——

*MR. SPEAKER: A new clause can only be moved after notice has been given. If the noble Lord and the right hon. Gentleman are agreed that this is substantially the same clause as appears on the Paper I will not interfere; otherwise it should be moved as on the Paper, and then amended by Amendments.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I understood that the clause had been already placed before you, Mr. Speaker; and I thought that the authorities were satisfied that it was substantially identical with that which originally appeared on the Paper.

MR. CHAPLIN: So far as my reading of the clause is concerned, having very carefully considered it, I think it is precisely to the same effect as that which the noble Lord had originally on the Paper. But if desired the latter can be amended by Amendment.

*Mr. SPEAKER: It is quite unnecessary if it is agreed that it is to the same effect.

Lord EDMOND FITZMAURICE: Then I beg to move, Sir.

New clause—

"The council of any administrative county where a parish council resolve that a rural district council ought to have taken steps for the adoption of Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, or to have exercised their powers under that part, and have failed to do so, the parish council may complain to the county council, and the county council, if satisfied after due inquiry that the district council have so failed, may resolve that the powers of the district council for the purposes of that part shall be transferred to the county council with respect to the parish, and they shall be transferred accordingly, and the resolution shall, if necessary, have effect as an adoption of that part by the district council, and, subject to the provisions of this Act, Section 63 of the Local Government Act, 1894, shall apply as if the powers had been transferred under that Act."—(Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice.)

—brought up and read the first time.

Sir WALTER FOSTER: I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman has accepted this clause, because it concedes the principle for which I have contended in the Committee stage as well as in the new clause moved to-day. The clause of my noble friend is based on one contained in the Local Government Act of 1894 which has been found to work very satisfactorily in many county councils when put in force in relation to other matters. I hope that the powers conferred by this Bill may be made more operative by this new clause.

*Sir F. S. POWELL (Wigan): When this Bill was before the Committee I objected to giving such power to the central authority on grounds I then stated; but these objections do not apply to the county council. My experiences of the county councils—although not a member of any—both in the West Riding and in Lancashire are of the most encouraging character. They are nearer the locality than the central Government can be; and they have the further advantage of representing the people. In fact, it is one popular authority controlling another popular authority. I am sure that difficulties which have arisen between the central authority and the local authority will not obtain in dealing with the county council. I welcome most heartily this clause, and I am sure the Bill, strengthened by this clause, will work a reform of great importance.

Mr. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton): I wish to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether, if the county council were to adopt this section, and put into force the powers of Part 3 in the area of any rural sanitary authority or parish council, the cost, if any, would be made a charge on the county rate or fixed on the rural or sanitary authority? If the cost were charged on the county rate it might be unfair to the other district councils.

Mr. CHAPLIN: This clause only applies in the case of a rural district council; and then only where it has been resolved by the parish council that the rural district council had failed in their duty in not adopting Part III. of the Act; or if they had adopted it, had failed in their duty to put it into force. Under those circumstances the County Council would be able to take over to itself the powers of the rural district council for housing the working classes, and to carry out the necessary works. The charge would be paid by the defaulting rural council.

Question put, and agreed to.

Clause added.

*Mr. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): If the President of the Board of Trade were here he would recall that the principle of the clause I wish to move was repeatedly argued both in the House and in the Committee upstairs, during the discussions on the Act of 1890. If there was force in the arguments for it in 1890, it is redoubled now, owing to the enormous and vital importance of dealing with overcrowding. Twenty years ago the question of housing was one rather of sanitation than of overcrowding; but every year since has tended to make the question turn upon the issue of overcrowding and to the aggravation and intensification of the evils of overcrowding. In view of the present circumstances it would be unreasonable to the teeming multitudes in our great towns, for whom we wish to find some outlet under the provisions of this Bill, if we did not apply the same reasoning and the same arguments to the re-housing of the people under Part 3, as amended by this Bill, that were applicable in former Bills to the question of insanitary areas and the pulling down of unhealthy habitations. Hon. Members are perfectly aware that the principle of excluding extra compensation in respect of compulsory purchase of insanitary areas and houses is applied to Parts 1 and 2 of the principal Act. What we wish is that, where you go outside the area of a district to carry out the purposes of Part 3, you should not be compelled to pay the enormous prices often demanded for land taken compulsorily under the Lands Clauses Acts. We had, on the second reading of this Bill, a most valuable discussion of the enormous enhancement in the value of suburban land that is sure to arise from the operations of county councils and other local authorities in going outside their own areas to compete for land for housing the working classes; what I am arguing now is that we should have the same principles applied to the outside land, as taken for a national and vital purpose, as are applied to land taken for dealing with insanitary areas and unhealthy houses. The evidence given by the Secretary for the Colonies, before the Housing Commission in 1884, was of the utmost importance on this point. He argued that the owner should obtain the fair market value at the time as between a willing seller and a willing buyer, and nothing more. "In practice they have succeeded in getting a great deal more." The Colonial Secretary also points out that "wherever an area was condemned as insanitary, all the owners within the area became subject to the terms of the Act, and their property, whether insanitary or not, could be acquired subject to no additional compensation in respect of compulsory purchase." That is a very strong argument for applying a similar principle to the purchase of land for the purposes of this Bill. In another reply to Lord Salisbury, the right hon. Gentleman said that in Birmingham they had two districts, one of which was an insanitary area, which they were providing a scheme to deal with, and another district called the improvement district, and it was there that they had to pay the 10 per cent. extra.

> "I say," said the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary, "that an owner in the improvement district should make the same sacrifice as the owners who were doing their duty in the insanitary area had to make for the public good; that is to say, they should be content with the full and fair value of their property, without this excessive additional sum, often much more than 10 per cent."

The right hon. Gentleman continues with the argument that owners would not suffer by the application of this principle to them in the improvement area he referred to; and by analogy the argument is good in the present Bill. Asked by Lord Salisbury whether hardship to the owner might not arise, and unpopularity for the scheme, he replied—

> "I do not think that under any scheme that could be arranged the owners would be badly off. They would always get more than they would themselves value their property at, supposing no scheme were in existence. Therefore, I do not think a scheme would be unpopular with the owners; it would be more unpopular with the ratepayers."

He gave illustrations as to how this extra 10 per cent. for compulsory purchase operated in Birmingham, and pointed out that where a man had bought real estate three years previously for £2,500, the corporation had to give him £6,000 for the same land in compulsory purchase under the Lands Clauses Act. My hon. friend the Member for Stepney, in moving his new clause, with the object of which I have the greatest sympathy, conclusively showed that the owners of the building land in the vicinity of great towns are perhaps the most favoured men with regard to taxation. They are assessed for the poor rate at the annual agricultural value of their land, which means that if you compare the agricultural value with the real capital value of the land, which they could command in the market at Tokenhouse Yard, and if they were taxed on anything like that real value, they are clearly being let off an enormous proportion of the share which they really ought to be paying for the purposes of local taxation. I do not wish to labour that point, except with regard to the particular argument before the Committee; but what does it mean? We know that the capital value of building land is from twenty to fifty, and sometimes 100 times the agricultural value of the land, and these owners have been receiving from the community for years an enormous bonus, by reason of the fact that the community and Parliament have not taxed their land at its capital value. I ask whether it is reasonable that these owners who have received these large bonuses should ask for this further concession upon the compulsory purchase of their land. We know very well that the moment county councils and local authorities go outside their own area to acquire land, that land immediately increases in value. The owners thus are certain to get, in any case, vastly more for their land than they otherwise would. And then these very owners have had this bonus in exemption from fair taxation for years past; and, further, this bonus has been doubled by the action of the right hon. Gentleman and his friends in passing the Agricultural Rating Act. In dealing with this problem of the re-housing of the working classes, to prevent overcrowding, which I place even above sanitation, I think the community have a right to acquire this land at its fair value, and no more. We do not want to pay these owners less than the fair value of their land, but we do not want to pay them more, because landowners on the borders of great and growing towns have for years past been the favourites of fortune, and it is only reasonable they should to a small extent share in the sacrifices for these reforms.

New clause—

"Where land is acquired under this Act otherwise than by agreement no additional compensation shall be given to the vendor in respect of compulsory purchase of such land." —(Mr. Channing.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

*Mr. McLAREN (Leicestershire, Bosworth): The argument of my hon. friend who introduced this clause has covered a rather wide ground, but it is a ground which we who sit on this side of the House have for years felt requires to be dealt with by some attempt at legislation. Whether we sit here as the representatives of local bodies anxious to acquire land for public purposes, or whether we sit here as the directors of public companies which have to acquire, as railway companies do, areas of land compulsorily, we always feel that there is something wrong in a system which allows those who promote schemes for the public benefit to be practically fined 10 per cent. upon the ascertained value of the land which they require for their purposes. My hon. friend attempts by this clause to strike out what I should call the 10 per cent. fine. I do not understand that he proposes to carry the matter further than that, or that he intends to be as revolutionary in his proposals as the hon. Member for Stepney, or to suggest that any landowner should get a penny less than the fair value of the land which he is called upon to part with; but he does say this: that where a person comes to an owner to acquire land upon which to build houses for the poor of the town it is only fair that the owner should give up his land for that purpose, and not ask any more for it than its fair value. I believe that this 10 per cent. is not a creation of a statute; that there is no Act of Parliament which provides that it shall be added to the price of any land which is purchased compulsorily. It is pure custom created by surveyors and legal persons during the growth of railways, and when the Committee is considering a question of philanthropy as well as of figures it is not unreasonable to say that a stop should be put to an arbitrary rule of this character. Take the case of a railway company. The land it seeks to acquire is agricultural land, and has no building value, and if the landowner sits on that land for half a generation he would not receive more for it than its fair value; but a railway comes along, takes some of the land and puts up buildings, and it at once attracts other builders, so that, so far from the owner being injured by his land being taken away, he is actually benefited. He not only gets rid of the land he parts with at its true value, but the rest of his land goes up in price. The same argument applies with greater force to municipal enterprise. Under these circumstances I think we ought to get rid of this 10 per cent.

Mr. CHAPLIN: This question was raised in Committee, and the hon. Member pressed it to a division, when the Committee decided by a large majority to reject his proposal, and I see no reason why I should accept the proposal on this occasion. I do not think the hon. Member has brought forward any additional reasons which should cause me to do so. The hon. Gentleman must remember that when land is taken under compulsory powers the 10 per cent. is not a matter of course—it is left to the discretion of the arbitrator to say what he considers is the fair value of the land, which hon. Gentlemen opposite are agreed is what ought to be given, and he usually gives 10 per cent. compensation for the compulsory purchase. It may be that the owner may consider that the land which he has to part with, when used for the purposes for which it is acquired, will be very detrimental to the property which he is left with, and, taking all the circumstances into consideration, 10 per cent. is not, I think, unfair. The hon. Member founded his argument to a great extent upon the cases that occur in Parts I. and II. of the Bill, but those are not at all analogous to any case under which land could be taken under Part III., because in Parts I. and II. different circumstances arise ; the areas there are taken over because they are insanitary.

*MR. CHANNING : May I interrupt the hon. Gentleman for a moment here? My argument is that under Part I. the 10 per cent. is not allowed in respect of property which in itself is perfectly sanitary.

MR. CHAPLIN : But in those areas which are so taken over there are insanitary areas. The land which is taken under Part III has never been an insanitary area. In the first place it is taken for the purpose of building houses upon, and it has not been built on before, and I cannot see on what ground the owner of that particular property which is to be used for a particular purpose is to be prevented from enjoying the same privilege that is extended to other landowners when their land is taken away. I have always acknowledged the importance of this particular question, but I have not heard a word of explanation to-night why one particular class is to be selected to pay a heavier burden than other classes of the community. We ought, in my opinion, to preserve to these people the same rights and privileges that we extend to other classes, and all that I ask is that in these cases, as in all others, it should be left to the unfettered decision of the arbitrator to fix the price to be paid for these properties, and to say whether, in taking these properties over, there are exceptional circumstances which justify him in awarding an additional 10 per cent. as compensation for compulsory purchase.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): When listening to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman and the arguments which he used my memory went back to six years ago and the passing of the Local Government Acts for England and Ireland. On those occasions I heard precisely the same arguments—I have no doubt from the right hon. Gentleman himself—but they did not convince the House of Commons or the House of Lords in the case of the English Local Government Act of 1893, and in the case of the Local Government Act of Scotland in 1894. Parliament put these words in the Acts of both countries—

> "Provided that in determining the amount of disputed compensation the arbitrator shall not make any additional allowance in respect of the purchase being compulsory."

That is the precedent which we ask the House to follow in the present case, for this simple reason : that in accepting this the right hon. Gentleman is carrying out what he contended for in the previous Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said—

> "What the owner of this land is entitled to is its fair capital value. I do not ask for anything more."

What we now ask is that these owners, when they come before the arbitrator, shall not be allowed to avail themselves of what I may call arbitrator-made law, and not Judge-made law. A disastrous precedent was set, after the passing of the Lands Clauses Act in 1885, that in addition to the price of the value of the land the owner should have a bonus of 10 per cent. No man more loudly denounced that than the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary, with respect to land acquired by municipal authorities. The right hon. Gentleman maintains that in addition to the full market price the owner should get this further amount. Although it may not be a convincing argument, you cannot shut out the fact that the land which will be required for these purposes must be in close propinquity to large towns, and it will be very much enhanced in value owing to its proximity to those towns. If the owner is to get the full market value, the House, I think, ought to follow the precedent created in the Local Government Acts of England and Scotland, that the community shall not be fined an additional 10 per cent. because they require the land for these purposes.

*MR. PERKS (Lincolnshire, Louth): The clause seems to me to be a most reasonable one, and I can see no reason why the Government cannot adopt it. It appears to me that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board must have forgotten that when a man is selling land for public purposes he not only usually gets the full market value, but he always gets large compensation for damage done to his severed land, and he invariably alleges that that is the most valuable piece of land he has got, and he gets a bonus because the rest of his land is depreciated in value. There is another point, which is this, that land taken in the suburbs of our towns for the erection of artisans' dwellings will bring on to that land a considerable population, and that for mercantile purposes, small shops and so forth, the adjacent land left in the hands of the vendor will be greatly increased in value. Another point is that the great cost of acquiring these lands is not the value of the land itself, but the enormous cost of surveyors, witnesses, counsel, solicitors, and a variety of other people who are almost invariably engaged before the arbitrator or a jury on compulsory purchases under the Land Clauses Act. The fact that there is in the Act a direct provision that nothing should be paid for taking land compulsorily will facilitate, to a very great extent, the acquisition of land by agreement between owners who wish to sell, and the community who wishes to buy, and that will be a very great advantage. We certainly ought not to lose sight of those considerations.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): We labour under a considerable disadvantage in discussing this subject in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Colonial Secretary. I was myself a member of the Royal Commission to which the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire refers, and I remember perfectly well that the Colonial Secretary was the clearest, ablest, and most valuable witness examined before that Commission. He showed to the satisfaction of the Commission that the proposal put forward for their consideration was consistent in itself, with full and complete justice to the owners of the land. No injury could follow the enforcement of this principle, and full and complete satisfaction would be obtained in all cases of compulsory sale. Now, I cannot see why, if the Government are really anxious to facilitate the question of the building, they cannot agree to this proposal. The landowners are all agreed that there is not the least risk of any kind whatsoever, and the county councils and the arbitrators feel every day the wrong that is done in this matter. My hon. friend has pointed out the enormous and permanent injury that has been done to the country by the imposition of this 10 per cent. in the schemes of the railways of this country. There is no doubt that it has hung round the neck of the railway systems a tremendous millstone, and from that the community suffers to-day. And it will continue to suffer if we add such a millstone to this Bill. Why should we add 10 per cent. over the value for compulsory purchase? I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say there was no statutory obligation upon arbitrators to give the 10 per cent.; but he knows perfectly well that if there is no statutory obligation it is the practice, and is equally strong, and that if it is sought to restrain it it can only be restrained by the insertion into the Bill of some such language as that read by the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton from the Local Government Act of six years back. Why not add that language to this Bill? The right hon. Gentleman has introduced the Bill much in the form and way in which he desired to have it; there has been no desire on the part of anyone upon this side of the House to do anything but to assist the right hon. Gentleman in passing it and improving it; and surely, under the circumstances, it is not too much to ask the right hon. Gentleman at this stage to accept an Amendment—an addition rather than an Amendment—without which there will be enormous difficulties in enforcing the law after the Bill has been passed by this House. I have the greatest desire to see this Bill become law, but I should like to see the additions made so that when it has become law it will be a practicable and useful law, and I firmly believe that without this Amendment its object will be considerably curtailed, and in some cases utterly destroyed.

SIR JOHN BRUNNER (Cheshire, Northwich): I was rather disappointed that the right hon. Gentleman did not favour us with a smile when he said that the great burden lay on a single class. It has become a commonplace that this class are not only not heavily burdened, but, on the other hand, that they are very greatly benefited by the existing state of the law. He said also that we ought not to take out of the pockets of one particular class to benefit the public. This Bill deals only with land, and it is obvious to anyone who considers the matter for a moment that we want no other class of property. We do not want to buy railway shares compulsorily. We do not want to buy household furniture compulsorily. We do not want to buy watches or jewellery compulsorily. I would put it to the House that in adopting this Amendment we shall not do what many of us do not care to do—we shall not go in advance of public opinion. I think it would be a very wholesome thing if the House by passing the Amendment were to repeal the injunction or advice given to the arbitrators six years ago. A railway director has told us in very feeling tones, and my hon. friend the Member for Leicester has repeated it, that railway companies, and they might have said other companies, have been mulcted in this particular 10 per cent. for compulsory purchase to the detriment of the public. When a corporation intending to make a profit out of its working comes before an arbitrator, the arbitrator always has in his mind that the company is working for profit, and that it ought to be made to pay. But here is the case of a local authority acting for the benefit of the whole community, and, under the present condition of the law, suffering a great hardship. The case is very different from that of a company desiring to make an actual profit. I would recommend to the House this argument. I believe it ought to have great weight with all of us. In this case we are attempting to improve the position of those whose condition is a danger to the public.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): The right hon. Gentleman opposite says there is no statutory authority for making this allowance, but that seems to me a strong argument in favour of the Amendment. It is a practice which has become so inveterate that unless the Legislature interferes no doubt it will go on. The right hon. Gentleman says it is right that the owner of the land should receive the full value of the land, and I entirely agree with that. How does it work out? It works out in this way. When the arbitrator has taken into account every consideration that can be urged by the owner of the land, he adds 10 per cent. The hon. Gentleman has reminded us that six years ago the Legislature deliberately put down an extra 10 per cent. in the case of land acquired by a parish council. I challenge any gentleman opposite to say why this 10 per cent. should be taken away in the case of land acquired by a parish council, and why it should be left in the case of land acquired for the purpose we are now considering. I think the case is stronger in the latter point than in the former. I do hope the House will not take a retrograde step this evening.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I want to put before the right hon. Gentleman one or two points in this matter which, I think, have been slightly overlooked. In the first place, this land which is to be taken under the Bill is land in all respects similar to land now taken by the rural authorities under the Act of 1894. It is land like that taken for rural purposes by the parish councils; that is to say, it is not land in town, it is land in the rural districts. That kind of land, by the Act of 1894, could be taken compulsorily for allotments and other purposes, and there was also power to hire land. This Bill does not give us any power to hire land. The powers in this Bill are less than those in the Act of 1894, and there is the reason why you should make them similar. I think we should be relieved from the possibility of having to pay 10 per cent. compensation for compulsory purchase. There is a certain amount of experience in reference to these methods before the House. During the last few years the House has passed two Allotments Acts and they have been failures. The Allotments Acts passed by the Conservative Government between 1886 and 1892 were Acts that gave little or no land to the labourers. The labourers did not get land in any large quantity till the 1894 Act came into operation. The experience of the working of those two Acts has shown that there is difficulty in using the methods of this Bill, and that there is an objection to the additional compensation. Although the addition to the price is comparatively small—it is not worth contending for on the part of the landowning classes—it forms a barrier. It checks the local authorities from carrying out what might be a beneficial piece of work for the locality. In the last two or three years I have brought instances before the House in which local authorities had been asked to pay such prohibitive prices that they have been unable to carry out the orders given to them for compulsory purchase. I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to make this small concession, which, if granted, would, I believe, make the Bill more popular and more efficient for the purpose for which it is intended.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

*MR. CHANNING: I understand that the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to accept the clause I now beg to move, and I wish to express my gratification that he has come to that decision with regard to this question. I frankly admit that he has greatly improved the Bill.

New clause—

"Where land is acquired under Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, otherwise than by agreement, any question as to the amount of compensation which may arise shall in default of agreement be determined by a single arbitrator, to be appointed and removable by the Local Government Board, or in the case of a council in London, by the Secretary of State."—(Mr. Channing.) —brought up, and read the first and second time, and added.

*MR. CHANNING: I do not know whether the right hon. Gentleman will consent to this proposition in the clause I now move. It is not inconsistent with the clause which has already been accepted on the motion of the noble Lord the Member for Cricklade. At the same time I admit that it would from the acceptance of that clause require some alteration, if the principle of it is accepted. The object of the clause, of course, is to give the right to the county council to refer to the Local Government Board to set the Act in operation. I think that is a proposal which ought to be embodied in the Bill in some way or other, and I beg to move.

New clause—

"The county council, on a representation from a parish council, or any twenty ratepayers within a rural district, may claim that the adoption of Part III. in such rural district shall be referred to the Local Government Board, and thereupon the Local Government Board may hold a local inquiry, and after considering the report of such inquiry may make an order requiring the district council to adopt Part 3 within a time and under conditions prescribed in the order."—(Mr. Channing.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

MR. CHAPLIN: I cannot accept this clause, for this reason. It would be inconsistent with the clause already accepted by the House. I think it would be unworkable.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I desire by the clause I now rise to move to raise the question which I raised in Committee, when the object I had in view received a considerable measure of support and sympathy from both sides of the House. I understand that my Amendment did not raise the question in the best possible manner, but the Government promised to consider the matter between that time and the Report stage. The object of my clause is to make it perfectly clear, at all events, that any county shall have power to acquire land, not only for the immediate, but also for the prospective needs of the locality. From the ground taken up by the right hon. Gentleman opposite, I understood him to say that there would be no limit to the amount of land which might be acquired for the purpose of providing dwellings for the people. I wish to examine that statement for a moment. I venture to think it is not quite accurate. Suppose we allow that a local authority has no power to acquire land, except so far as it is authorised by the Legislature to acquire land for a specific purpose. Here it is authorised to acquire land for the purposes of Part III. What are the purposes of Part III.? It is to supply the needs of the locality in respect of dwellings for the working classes. I think that in the present state of the law one is compelled to come to the conclusion that the needs of the locality would be held to mean the existing needs of the locality. I do not mean to say that the Legislature would hold the councils very strictly to provide merely for the existing needs of the locality, but that they would hold them to this extent: that there must be needs actually existing, or needs that would arise in the immediate future. If we leave this matter in doubt, a local authority will stand in an unsatisfactory position. In the first place, the money which it pays for land may be disputed by the Local Government Board auditor; and in the second place, which is probably a more formidable matter, as I understand, it would be quite possible for any ratepayer who found himself aggrieved to consider that the local authority were exceeding their powers, and to go to a court of law asking an injunction to restrain them. So far as regards acquiring land by agreement, I think it will be obvious that it is precisely in those cases where it would be most for the public interest to acquire land, in order to make provision for the prospective needs of a locality, that the holders of the land would be least willing to sell; that is to say, you must contemplate a case in which land is perhaps in the hands of a single holder, or two or three individual holders, who are keeping it out of the market, and where it will be necessary for the local authority, if they want the land, to get it by compulsion. In that case the local authority would have to apply for a Provisional Order, and I scarcely think that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General will say that a local authority applying for an Order will be able to include in that land to meet needs which may arise after twenty or twenty-five years. I find that the procedure provided by law with respect to petitions for Provisional Orders is very stringent. It is absolutely within the discretion of the Local Government Board either, on the one hand, to dismiss the petition, or, on the other, if it is disposed to regard it with favour, it must, as I read the section, hold a local inquiry. In these circumstances, I do not think you can seriously say that, under the law as it at present stands, a Provisional Order could be got conferring powers on a local authority to acquire land the need for which would not arise for twenty or twenty-five years. It is very desirable, in order to prevent litigation and disputes, that the matter should be perfectly plain. I beg to move the clause which stands in my name.

New clause—

"Where it appears to any council which has adopted Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, that land will be required for supplying the needs of their district in respect of lodging-houses within any period not exceeding twenty-five years, such land may be acquired under the provisions of that part."—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

*MR. HAZELL (Leicester): I have an Amendment down later on, which I understand is out of order, covering very much the same ground as that now under discussion, so that I should like to say a few words in support of the clause of my hon. and learned friend. It appears to me that this House is in danger of rivetting upon the neck of the local authorities so many fetters that it will be very difficult to carry out any housing schemes at all. I do not know whether there are many in this House, but there are a number of people in the country, who regard what they are pleased to term "municipal trading," with a great deal of suspicion. But if we have confidence in local authorities and believe that they know the needs of their localities and are able to carry on their schemes with wisdom and honesty I think we ought to give them rather a freer hand than they will have under the Bill at present, which confirms the custom of their paying an exaggerated price for land which they require. Unless this clause is inserted we shall put the local authorities in a position different from that of any private buyer. It is notorious that private undertakings when they desire to acquire land watch the changes in the market and seize the opportunity to buy at a favourable time, but Parliament so hampers local authorities that they are obliged to buy land at a high price, if at all, and if they have more than they want they must sell it again. We are on the eve of great developments in electric traction, and it is perfectly clear that a far-sighted, clear-headed local authority would see that when electric tramways get out into the suburbs great areas of land, which are now used for agricultural purposes, would be most suitable for housing the working classes. If they had a freer hand and were able to look forward to the future it would be possible to buy that land now one-fifth or even one-tenth of the price which would have to be paid for it in the future. Therefore in the interest of local economy I hope the House will agree to the clause.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): When this matter was before the House on a previous occasion the Government promised to consider it. We have looked into the question, and we find that the matter has been several times before the Courts. The effect of the decisions has been that the local authority cannot apply land taken for the purpose of erecting lodging-houses, or indeed for any purpose for which they have statutory powers, to any other purpose of a permanent nature without, of course, the authority of a fresh Act of Parliament, but that in the case of land taken for the purpose of erecting lodging-houses they may apply it temporarily, and even for a very considerable space of time, to any purpose not inconsistent with its being ultimately used for the purpose for which it was acquired.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I think it is entirely in the discretion of the Local Government Board.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: Not entirely If the land is not required for lodging houses it must be sold, except where otherwise directed by the Local Government Board. No doubt a considerable amount of discretion is left to the Local Government Board, but in one of the cases to which I have referred the learned Judge went so far as to say there was no obligation if by any possibility at any future time the land could be applied.

MR. PICKERSGILL: But the Court of Appeal did not confirm that.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: The Court of Appeal did not adopt that dictum; it was a mere dictum of the learned Judge, and was not necessary for the purpose of the decision. It really amounts to this—that land cannot be permanently used for any purpose other than that for which it is acquired. As regards the acquisition, I apprehend there is no rigid fetter upon the local authority; they are not bound to show that they are going to build upon the land at once, but there must be a reasonable prospect of their building upon it in the near future. The sanction is really in most cases to borrowing for the purpose of buying land, and if it appears that the local authority have not genuinely in view the erection of lodging-houses as certain to take place in the near future, it is hardly a case of buying land for the purpose of erecting lodging-houses. I would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman who moved this clause to see how it would work in practice. He proposes that if land is acquired for the erection of lodging-houses, it should be so used within any period not exceeding twenty-five years. How is a section of that kind to be worked unless the gift of prophecy can be conferred upon the local authority, and also upon the authority who are to sanction the loan? How is it possible to say whether the land will be wanted in the course of twenty-five years, and, if so, whether the loan should be sanctioned? If it is not required for twenty-six years, it would be beyond the scope of the Act. I submit that such a clause is not practicable or workable, and that it is far better to leave the Bill in a somewhat elastic state as at present, so that if the land is genuinely being acquired for the erection of lodging-houses, somewhere in the near future, the sanction to the loan will be given. I am quite sure from cases that the local authorities are by no means very rigidly tied down as to the exact quantity of land that is acquired. If they see that in the course of the next few years they will want lodging-houses to accommodate, say, 500 people, and that there is a probability of an extension being required, there would be nothing to prevent them asking for sanction to a loan to acquire a larger quantity of land. Under all the circumstances, I submit that the clause moved by the hon. and learned Gentleman is not really wanted, and I trust the House will not accept it.

*Mr. PERKS: Surely instead of being left, as the Attorney General suggested, to feel our way throughout the decisions of the various Coruts, about the effect of which he himself did not appear to be very clear, it would be far better to try to adapt this clause so as to enable a local authority to exercise the power of purchasing land which may be required, say, not within a limited period of twenty-five years—as that, I admit, might land you in the same dilemma as the Workmen's Compensation Act has with reference to the height of scaffolding—but within a reasonable period. Local authorities may be permitted by definite statutory enactment to acquire sufficient land for meeting the future necessities of the localities. It does not seem to me to be beyond the capabilities of the Law Officers to devise such a clause, and I submit that it would be far better to do that than to leave the question to be threshed out under conflicting decisions in the different Courts of Law.

*Sir F. S. POWELL: The House should bear in mind that the acquisition of land may not prove to be any advantage to the purchasing authority. The land must be paid for by loan, and the interest on the loan rapidly accumulates, so that at the end of twenty or twenty-one years a local authority would find that they had paid in interest, beyond the amount of the purchase money, such a sum as made the purchase a very dear one, and one by no means advantageous to the authority. The House ought also to remember that the management of land always involves expense, that there may be various losses, such as the non-payment of rent, and that such a transaction, when it comes to be worked out as a question of finance and economy, may prove to be most expensive. These points ought to be considered before we give such a power to a district. I certainly think that many districts are far too sanguine as to their future. Many districts grow and grow again to the satisfaction and the wealth of all; but many districts, on the other hand, do not grow—in fact, they rather decay; and I think in some of these cases it would be a great mistake to acquire land in the manner suggested. There is also this further consideration: there is such a thing as fashion among the working classes, and I do not know that in all cases land acquired by a locality for the working classes will be popular amongst those classes in twenty years' time. A district which is very attractive to-day may, in the course of those years, lose all its charms; for it must be remembered, when you plant a large colony in a country district, it ceases to a large extent to be a country district, and the attraction then goes. I am very glad the Bill has been so well received by the House, and I rejoice to find that it will soon become law, but I certainly think that a clause of this kind would be not an improvement, but an injury to the Bill.

Mr. JONATHAN SAMUEL: I believe that this clause has been moved with the very best intentions, but I hope my hon. and learned friend will not press it to a division. I feel quite sure that it is much better to leave the Bill rather indefinite than to fix a period in the way suggested. In my opinion, as one having some experience in municipal work, a clause like this is practically impossible; you cannot estimate in any given town what will be the requirements for a period of twenty-five years, because some towns grow very rapidly, while others grow but slowly. There is also this danger. You have in every town a number of men who are speculators, and there is a possibility of their speculating in land and then becoming members of a local authority which may require to purchase that land for use within the period of twenty-five years. I may say that I do not consider that this Bill will be of very great value in any case—I have said so before—for the simple reason that no corporation is likely to undertake to purchase land outside its own area. I am sorry the clause put down by the hon. Member for South Shields, by which a municipality would have power to extend its boundaries so as to take in the land they may require, has been ruled out of order, but, in any case, I think it would be a danger to give these local authorities power to purchase land outside their own areas for the building of lodging-houses or houses to cover a period of twenty-five years in advance. Such a power might suit an authority like the County Council for London, but for an ordinary municipality it would be a danger, and, if exercised, might become a very serious burden on the ratepayers. I think the best thing is to leave the Bill, as the Attorney General says, in an elastic state, and therefore I hope the clause will not be pressed.

MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Canarvonshire, Eifion): I think the objection of my hon. friend is more applicable to the Bill as a whole than to this particular clause. No doubt in all cases of this kind there is a danger of jobbery being indulged in by the local authority, but I am sure that that danger is greater and stronger with respect to the powers immediately given by the Bill than to the provision contained in this clause. The object of the clause is to enable corporations to buy without being driven into a corner in order to provide for the future. The probabilities are that corporations will not be induced to enter into any engagements for the future unless they have an opportunity for doing so advantageously by getting land very cheap. There is also an objection of the Attorney General which, on consideration, I do not think will be found to be so strong as he supposes. He suggested that this clause gave power to anticipate for a period of twenty-five years only, and that it might turn out that twenty-six years would elapse before the land was required, and he seemed to imply that, therefore, the clause would be entirely inoperative. I differ from that view. It seems to me that the effect is that where a local authority contemplates the possibility of building within twenty-five years they may purchase without the consent of the authority or the approval of the Local Government Board, but if the twenty-five years elapse and their anticipations have not been verified, and a year or two more is required before they can build, they would then require a direction from the Board before they could keep the land any longer. I fail to see that any difficulty would arise, and I hope the clause will be agreed to.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I am sorry to gather from the remarks of the Attorney General that he will not add anything of this kind to the Bill. I have once or twice pointed out that we want, as far as we can, to give the local authorities encouragement to obtain land. Everybody must remember that there are a great many difficulties connected with taking land outside the area of the municipality. In the first place, a municipality by so doing will be putting property within another rating area, and will have no opportunity of bringing that property within the borough or municipality which purchases the land. It would also be spending money outside its own area, and would be removing its own people out of its own area, and adding to the rateable value of another authority, and to its own detriment to a certain extent. The only thing that would induce them to do this work is the idea of doing good to the people of their own district. Moreover, in a few years time they may possibly be in the position of having land outside their own area which is only partly occupied by their own people, and they may have built up a whole village or district which will be occupied by people unconnected with the original municipality, and paying rates to a municipality which has done nothing in the way of housing the people. Therefore, I think if you were to extend the Bill by putting in the words "within a reasonable period," or something of that kind, it would be an inducement to local authorities to acquire land. I gather from the Attorney General that in his view the administration of the Bill would give the local authorities that wider power of acquisition, and that the Local Government Board in sanctioning a loan would always act liberally in this respect. I think that is the strongest concession we can obtain on this particular point, and having that admission from the Attorney General, no doubt with the sanction of the Local Government Board to such an interpretation of the manner in which the Act will be administered by that Department, we must be content. At the same time I am sorry we cannot put into the Bill words to make it clear to the local authorities that they will not be limited in taking land to the immediate necessities they desire to meet.

MR. CHAPLIN: I can assure the hon. Gentleman opposite that this matter has been most carefully considered by the Attorney General, in conference with myself and the officials of the Local Government Board, and if we were of opinion that there was the slightest doubt upon the matter we should have endeavoured to frame an Amendment to meet the necessities of the case. But that was not the view of the Attorney General, and I entirely concur in his opinion. If hon. Members will look at the words of the Bill I think their apprehensions will be altogether removed. There is absolutely no limitation in the words of the Bill on the power to purchase to which the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman is directed, so long as it is for the purpose and subject to the provisions of the Bill. Neither is there any obligation to sell under any circumstances unless the land is not required for the purpose for which it was purchased, and even then the Local Government Board has a dispensing power and is able to say that the land need not be sold, although it is not required for the purpose for which it was acquired. I hold that the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman would be unfortunate, and would be a distinct limitation of the powers already possessed by local authorities, and I can conceive cases in which it would be an absolute hindrance. The hon. Gentleman desires to limit the period to twenty-five years. There is no such limitation in any Act of Parliament of which I am aware. Take a case in which a local authority has bought some land for the purpose of housing the working classes. Adjoining that land there may be a small or large plot of land which it would be extremely desirable to purchase, land which in a few years is sure to go up in price, and which, if it was not for the limitation of the hon. Gentleman's Amendment, the local authority might be very anxious to purchase. I am speaking of land which might be subject to a lease for thirty years. Any Amendment of this nature would absolutely defeat the object and purpose of the Bill, and I hope the hon. Gentleman will not go to a division, because I think it is quite unnecessary.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I would ask leave to withdraw.

Motion and clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): The Amendment I have on the Paper appears to be somewhat mystical in its drafting, but its object is very simple. It will leave the incidence of rating in connection with this matter exactly as at present. When I moved this Amendment in Committee my right hon. friend said he would consider it before Report, and as I have perfect confidence in the justice of my Amendment, and also in the right hon. Gentleman, I shall say no more for the Amendment, but simply move.

The Amendment was—

"In Clause 1, page 1, line 26, to leave out the words 'special and.'"

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): On a point of Order, Sir. Do I understand that this Amendment will have the effect of changing the taxation under the Bill? If so, of course it is not competent for it to come before us at this stage.

MR. CHAPLIN: At present the expenses of a district council under Part III. are "special" expenses unless the county council make them "general" expenses. Under the Bill as it stands they would be "general" expenses unless the Local Government Board made them "special." It reverses, so to speak, the presumption of law, but the effect, I believe, would be practically the same.

MR. CALDWELL: It must be a change of incidence if you are changing them from "special" into "general." Would the same ratepayer pay under the Amendment in the same proportion as under the Bill? That is the point, I think.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL: I think we ought——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! There is no question before the House, as these observations were directed to a point of order. I was not aware that any question of this kind arose, and I have not examined the section referred to, but I understand from the right hon. Gentleman that this does not cause a change in the incidence of taxation.

MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL: I rose to a point of order, though I did not say so. I understood from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Thirsk, when this matter was discussed on a previous occasion, that it would alter very considerably the incidence of local rating. If that is so, I think before deciding on the question we ought to have a full explanation from the Attorney General.

*MR. CHANNING asked whether this proposal would not have the effect of transferring part of the rates from agricultural ratepayers to the ratepayers in respect of houses or other property in villages or towns.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY said the effect of this Amendment would be that the expenses would be "special" unless the county council made them general.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Amendment is not in order.

Bill to be read the third time upon Thursday.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS BILL.

Order for consideration of Bill as amended (by the Standing Committee) read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now considered."

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): On the consideration of this Bill, I wish to offer a few remarks as to its provisions as amended by the Standing Committee. As the right hon. Gentleman will remember, I dealt, perhaps at some length, on the general aspect of the Bill on its Second Reading. I do not propose to deal with it in the same sense now as I did then, but I wish to draw attention to one or two points which it may be desirable to consider before we proceed with the Report stage.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Lord HUGH CECIL, Greenwich). House counted, and, forty Members being found present,

*MR. CHANNING resumed: I would desire to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman and the House to one of the points of the Bill, to which great exception was taken not only on the second reading, but also in the Standing Committee as well as in the country. That is the provision with regard to arbitration. I understood that the right hon. Gentleman gave an undertaking in the Standing Committee that Cause 2 should be amended in somewhat the sense which I then suggested. The Bill in its present form gives first place to an agreement as superseding, where it exists, the arbitration procedure. The effect of the clause as it now stands places the landlord in a position in which he might really dictate the whole mode of procedure, and even name the arbitrator. It provides that an agreement, if it existed, should entirely supersede the operation of the arbitration procedure, and that the arbitration procedure could only come into effect where there was no agreement. Very strong objection has been taken to that proposal, and in the Standing Committee I understood from the right hon. Gentleman that that part of the Bill would be amended in the sense which I and other hon. Members suggested—namely, that an agreement should not supersede the arbitration procedure, and that the arbitration procedure should come into operation if either party desired it. That is a very important point, and I wish to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to it. Then there was another matter which has somewhat a comical aspect. Some amusing speeches were made on the Second Reading as to the relations of this Bill to Scotland. The clause as it now stands was the result of communications between the right hon. Gentleman and the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture; but the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture have now come to an exactly opposite conclusion, and have decided, after a very prolonged discussion, that it would be far better to revert to the original clause of the old Act of 1883. That is a serious situation, on which I think it would be well to have some light before we proceed further. It also seems to me that it would be extremely desirable if, in legislation of this kind, the Government would place the landlord and the tenant absolutely on an equal footing as regards the initiation of proceedings under the Act, and also as regards certain stages of the proceedings so far as is possible, especially the lodging of claims. Several Amendments were adopted upstairs, but they do not go far enough. What is really desired is that there should be an equality of position, and that as a corollary the landlord should be given the right of initiating proceedings under the Act. Then the Bill improves very greatly the procedure of arbitration, but does nothing to improve the status and position of valuers and arbitrators to be employed under the Act. I think that is a very grave omission. It seems to me that the success of the Act will largely depend on the improvement it effects in the status of valuers and arbitrators. The Act of 1883 failed principally owing to the inferior status, character, and capacity of a great many local valuers who had to carry it out. These will be eliminated to a certain extent by the adoption of a single arbitrator procedure, and I hope the Board of Agriculture, under their powers under this Bill, may be able to do something in the direction of weeding out unsatisfactory valuers, to be succeeded by a better class, who will deal with this question in a broad spirit. I regret very much that we were unable in the Standing Committee to obtain any real and substantial extension of the Bill with regard to essential improvements, which have done so much to keep both landlord and tenant going during the period of agricultural depression. The Government have given a concession, in making an allowance for seeds, but it does not go half far enough. It seems to me that the right of the tenant who, by great sacrifices, has created on the estate of the landlord one of its most valuable assets—namely, permanent pasture—should be recognised. That is a serious blot on the Bill, and if it is passed without that defect being remedied, I can only repeat what I said on the Second Reading—that the Bill will not go far enough in dealing with an essential situation. A tenant who improves the land to the highest degree, and who employs a large amount of capital, ought to get the sort of protection he really needs. I wish to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to these points, the first of which I understood the right hon. Gentleman gave an undertaking to rectify — namely, the placing of an agreement before the procedure for arbitration.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): At this stage I desire to raise a point in connection with the Bill which I think is of the most vital importance, and I would wish to know what action the Government intend to take regarding it. There is much in this Bill of which I heartily approve, and I should be extremely sorry to see it lost, but I think the Government have brought it on at a very inconvenient time. I understand there is to be a meeting of the Central Chamber of Agriculture to meet Members representing agricultural constituencies to consider the provisions of this Bill, and it is a pity that the Bill has been brought on before we have had the advantage of their opinion regarding it. I may say at once that the question which I consider of vital importance is the question of the arbitrator not giving any details whatever as to the reasons for his award of compensation, and I think we should have a very definite explanation from the Government in this matter. One of the objects of the Act of 1883 was to alter the very slipshod and unsatisfactory method of making valuations both on behalf of the landlord and on behalf of the tenant, and it was distinctly stated in Section 19 that the arbitrator should give the reasons—the broad reasons, at all events—on which he based the amount of his award. This has been entirely dropped in this Bill. No doubt it is the wish of the Government to simplify matters, and I believe that one of the chief arguments which will be used against giving details is that it will do away almost entirely with litigation, and also with the right of appeal. I, personally, do not in the least care about the right of appeal, but I do care very much indeed that the arbitrator should give reasons for his decision. I think it is perfectly easy to understand why it is desirable that these details should be given. It is ridiculous to provide that an arbitrator should simply state that he awards a sum of £300 or £400 which the incoming tenant has to pay to the outgoing tenant, and yet give no reason whatever for that award. It would be equally unfair for an arbitrator to decide that the outgoing tenant should pay £200 to the landlord for dilapidation and state no reasons. Take a very simple instance. The arbitrators may act, and, I believe, will act, in all good faith, but it is perfectly plain that a clerical error may occur. Take the case of a tenant with a mill on his farm. With the consent of his landlord he has put new machinery into that mill. He dies, and the arbitrator fixes the amount of the compensation to be paid to his executors. In perfect good faith the agent states that the improvements and works were carried out by the tenant, but by a clerical error the landlord is credited with the new machinery, and the arbitrator thereupon proceeds to award to the executors a sum of £50, which, under the circumstances, would be a grave injustice, and there is no possible means of finding out if a clerical error had been committed. This is, of course, a very strong case, but it might arise. Take another case. A tenant goes to a landlord and asks that a certain field may be drained. The question arises to who is to pay, and ultimately the tenant carries out the work. He dies leaving a widow who knows nothing about the drainage, and it would be perfectly easy in that case, owing to a clerical error, for the arbitrator to conclude that it was the landlord and not the tenant who drained the field. It is to the interest of the landlord as well as to the interest of the tenant that the arbitrator should give the reasons on which he based his decision. With regard to valuers and arbitrators they stand very high indeed, but I think it would very greatly raise their status if they were required to give details of their decision. I myself cannot understand what the difficulty in the way is. I do not wish an arbitrator to go into every minute detail, but he should give the broad reasons. He should state, for instance, how much was given to the tenant for tillage, and how much for drainage and other permanent movements, and then again, how much was given to the landlord for unpaid rent, and how much for waste, and how much, if any, for breach of the contract of tenancy. I do think, broadly speaking, that this question will commend itself to most men. It is not a difficult question in the least to understand, even by those not engaged in agricultural pursuits. In the interests of landlord and tenant it would be far more convenient, and would improve this Bill enormously. I do not think it matters one bit whether we have a right of appeal or not; for there is no doubt that if the umpire or arbitrator were to state under what heads he gave certain sums of money, and it was found that these were unfair, he would instantly lose caste in the county and nobody would employ him again. The effect of that would be to raise the status of the arbitrator, and it would be a matter of convenience to landlord and tenant. Under the present proposal the arbitrator is to go through a hundred matters, and at the end he is to give his decision; but no one can tell whether he has given consideration to any one of these matters. Unless some satisfactory answer to this question is given by the Government, I shall use every endeavour to hinder the progress of the Bill, though I admit there are many things in it of which I heartily approve. I think, really, that the Government ought to give way on some points.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): All the points raised by the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire and the noble Lord the Member for Horncastle, with one exception, will be raised in regard to new clauses to be moved on Report stage. The one question which could not be raised by any Amendment is as to the effect of an agreement under Clause 2, to which reference was made by the hon. Gentleman opposite. I was astonished to hear him say that he came away from the Committee upstairs with the impression that I had undertaken to consider his Amendment to the Bill which would have had the effect of destroying the purpose of an agreement between landlord and tenant.

*MR. CHANNING: I consented to withdraw my Amendment in Committee on the distinct understanding that the Government promised to consider and provide for it before the Report stage.

*MR. LONG: I cannot admit that I entered into any agreement to leave the matter in that way. I do not recollect that I did so, and it certainly never entered into my mind that I should be able to accept an amendment which would destroy the effect of an agreement between landlord and tenant. What I undertook to consider was whether it would be possible to deal with cases in which there was an unwilling agreement. The view the Government have taken throughout, with regard to the relations of landlord and tenant, is that we believe the tenant is very well able, if he chooses, to examine for himself, and to make up his mind for himself, what the form the agreement ought to take. And if he chooses to enter into an agreement with the landlord as to arbitration, we have not thought it desirable to substitute the arbitration procedure of the Bill for any procedure so adopted as between landlord and tenant. The next question is as to Sub-section 4, Clause 1. The hon. Member said that the Amendment on that was the result of a conference with the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture, but it was amended in Committee in a direction which, I am sure, will secure justice to all parties. The hon. Member also expressed his hope that the landlord and tenant should be placed on the same footing, and that the landlord should be able to initiate proceedings. I was rather surprised to hear him express that pious hope in regard to the footing of equality of landlord and tenant in relation to operations on the farm. A landlord enjoys at Common Law certain rights which he is entitled to enforce, and therefore there is an essential difference between the position of landlord and tenant. Unless you are prepared to deprive the landlord of those rights which he enjoys at Common Law—and this, I take it, is not desired by the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire—it is impossible to put the landlord and tenant on an equality. As to giving the landlord power to initiate proceedings, that would be obviously unnecessary and useless, because, as I have said, you cannot get rid of his rights at Common Law. I agree with the hon. Member that the position of valuers would be materially improved by the adoption of the procedure under this Bill. It will increase their dignity and throw a greater responsibility upon them than at present. But for the Board of Agriculture to select arbitrators, and thus to limit the choice to those so selected, would, I think, be most undesirable. It would be extremely difficult for a satisfactory and sufficiently comprehensive list to be adopted to suit the requirements of all parts of the country, and enable parties to feel certain that they would get justice done. In regard to the question of permanent pasture raised by the Amendment on the Paper, I will deal with it when we reach it. But I may say that although I regard permanent pasture as a great advantage to a farm when properly laid down, I will endeavour later on to give my reasons for believing that it would be unfair and undesirable to give the tenant the right to lay down permanent pasture without the consent of the landlord; the exercise of such a right would involve a complete change in the character and nature of the holding. My noble friend the Member for Horncastle raised another point altogether. I confess I was a little astonished at his blaming the Government for bringing on this Bill at this time. He suggested that we should have waited till the meeting of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, but I would remind him that the date of that meeting had not then been fixed. When the time comes when he will be responsible for the business of Parliament he will realise that we cannot be guided in our business arrangements here by those of outside parties, otherwise public business would be indefinitely prolonged, and I am inclined to think that that is not desirable. I am now going to deal with what is undoubtedly a very important point, and that is the action of the Government in regard to arbitration proceedings. In the first place the Government were urged, I may say on all sides, when we were considering this question at its earliest stages, to secure machinery for the settlement of differences between landlord and tenant which would be economical both in regard to money and time, and which would make the settlement of these differences as simple as it could possibly be made. The Royal Commission which dealt with this subject recommended that the procedure of the Arbitration Acts should be applied to the settlement of these differences. That procedure is a single arbitrator, from whose decision, in reference to facts, there is no appeal. He gives his award exactly in the form provided by this Bill. What is it that my noble friend is afraid of? He gives us as an illustration a case regarding mill machinery, in which an injustice has been done through a clerical error; but it struck me that it was an illustration of injustice arising not so much owing to a clerical error as to a misstatement of fact. My noble friend will not depend on the award of the arbitrator; he wants to know what the different claims are by the tenant, and the different awards by the arbitrator. But suppose there are two classes of property owned by the same man—say, 1,000 acres of agricultural land and 1,000 acres of urban land. Some of the urban land is taken, and there is an arbitration as to the price; he gets his award on a single sheet of paper, without any details as to the value of the different parts of the property. Why not adopt the same procedure in regard to agricultural land? My noble friend says he does not care about an appeal; he only wants the information as to the valuation of the different parts of the property. But what, I ask, is the use of that information if there is no appeal?

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY: I say if you had it you would never employ the arbitrator again.

*MR. LONG: If the arbitrator has given an unfair award, you would discover that without taking the award to pieces. If you are going to give the heads under which the award is decided, or the reasons for the amount at which the arbitrator arrives at his figures, you must give an appeal in order that the differences of estimate may be ascertained. The moment you give an appeal you get rid of the simplicity and finality of these proceedings, and thus introduce litigation. Now, our main object in introducing the Arbitration Act procedure is that we may simplify the machinery, cheapen the procedure, and give to the arbitrator a responsible position so as to enable him to settle definitely and once for all, all matters of fact—leaving an appeal only on matters of law. This procedure of the Arbitration Act has been successful where it has been employed. In no other kind of arbitration is it necessary for the arbitrator to give reasons for his decision or the heads of his award; and I do not see why we should give a procedure to agricultural tenancies different from that in all other arbitrations. My noble friend concluded his remarks by saying that if my reply was not satisfactory he would offer every opposition to the passage of this Bill. I would point out that there will be abundant scope for him on Report stage to criticise the parts of the Bill to which he objects without the sweeping method of rejecting the whole Bill.

*EARL PERCY (Kensington, S.): I am not at all surprised that my noble friend the Member for Horncastle should have adopted the point of view that he did, both on the ground as to the time selected by the Government for bringing this measure before the House, and on the ground of the provisions which it contains. The hon. Member for East Northamptonshire complained that the Bill had been brought on before the meeting of the Central Chamber of Agriculture. That is not a point on which I feel strongly, although the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill might have deferred the consideration of the Bill until he had had the opportunity of hearing the opinion of that body. But there is another point of far greater importance than that of the opinions of chambers of agriculture. Many Members who take a great interest in the Bill were given to understand, through the ordinary channels of communication, that the measure would not be taken for several days, and it was with considerable surprise that we saw, last Friday, that the Bill, instead of being made the third Order of the Day, was put down as second. It must be remembered that comparatively few on this side of the House were present on the Select Committee, and it cannot be denied that the procedure adopted is not a very satisfactory one for discussing such debatable provisions as are contained in this Bill, especially for hon. Members who are engaged on Committees on other Bills. I think the Government would have consulted the convenience of their friends by postponing the consideration of this measure. I do not believe there is any real demand for the Bill, and I cannot conceive that there is any great advantage in it over the Bill of 1883. It, however, to a certain extent, simplifies procedure, and we are all in favour of simpler procedure, of getting rid of the legal element as far as possible, and of reducing cost. But the Bill goes far beyond that, and introduces principles of a totally different and debatable character to which many in this House, and outside it, object. One is the limitation of the landlord's right of distraint, which, in my opinion, is against the policy systematically argued for fifteen years, of increasing the number of small holdings. Then it increases the number of cases in which the tenant may claim compensation for improvements which he has carried out without the consent of the landlord. I hold strong opinions on that point. I think that you should limit the number of improvements which the tenant may embark upon without the consent of the landlord to those which are absolutely necessary for the proper cultivation of the holding. The moment you go beyond those improvements absolutely necessary to proper cultivation, and go in for orchards, osier beds, permanent pasture, etc., you introduce a radically different principle from that which has been long established—a principle capable of very serious and indefinite extension. There is another point in regard to the question of an appeal from a decision of an arbitrator. The right hon. Gentleman has told us that this Bill does not introduce any very material difference in the practice of the present law.

*MR. LONG: It does introduce a radical change.

*EARL PERCY: Yes, a radical change in this sense: that you get rid of the power of appeal; and that is one of the points to which I most object. You set up a single arbitrator without any limits to his discretion. He has no assessor, and from his decisions you have no right of appeal. He has the power of entirely confiscating the property of the landlord and transferring it to the tenant. Now, my noble friend asks a very simple question. He asks the right hon. Gentleman to give an assurance that provision shall be made in the Bill that the arbitrator will state the reasons for his award. But the right hon. Gentleman says that if such a provision is made it will be necessary to retain the right of appeal. For my part I should be very much in favour of retaining the right of appeal, and I frankly admit that I disagree with the measure on that point, and agree with my noble friend. If there were a right of appeal to a judicial court we should soon create a general code which would be a guide to future arbitrators. By an appeal, for instance to a County Court Judge, you would obtain a decision from a competent judicial authority, and that decision would be a guide, as I have said, to the arbitrators; but at present there is no principle to assist them. One arbitrator gives his decision on one principle which appeals to him, and another on another principle. It is only by an appeal to a court of justice that you can get a definite code of principles which would be binding on the arbitrators. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question on one point. When he talks of the necessity of an appeal, if the arbitrator gives details under separate heads of the award, I think he is probably confusing two points of view which are really distinct—that is an appeal on a question of law and an appeal on a question of fact. The Bill proposes to do away with an appeal on questions of fact, but not on questions of law. The right hon. Gentleman says that no details are given in the award in commercial cases, or in cases of the compulsory purchase of land in towns. There is one answer to that, and that is that the owners of that class of property have never had a right to appeal against the decision of the arbitrator, whereas since 1883 the holders of agricultural property have, equally with the tenants, had a right of appeal. But another point far stronger than that is that in the case of the compulsory purchase of land I believe it is the fact that the arbitrator always states a case for a superior court on his own initiative. Therefore, it is always possible for the parties to the dispute to get a decision upon questions of law as well as questions of fact. But it will be said that under this Bill they can also appeal; that they can go to the County Court and say this is a question of law, and ask for a mandamus against the arbitrator, calling upon him to state a case. But you cannot appeal for the statement of a case without knowing the facts, and if the arbitrator makes the award in a lump sum upon two schedules, each containing fifteen or twenty provisions, how is it possible for any landowner or tenant to lay his finger upon a particular point as the point where the particular question of law has arisen? All we ask is that the right hon. Gentleman will consider the points I have placed before him. I am not a legal authority, but I have studied this subject with some care, and I am certain that if leave is given, the principle on which it will be given is on a question of law. Such a solution as has been suggested will relieve the Member for the Horncastle Division of Lincolnshire from the painful necessity of obstructing this Bill. I do not myself desire to obstruct it, and should be glad to see it passed into law; but I do think there are many points which require consideration.

CAPTAIN PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Woodbridge): This question of arbitration is a simple one, but I think there is some misapprehension with regard to it. As we read the Bill I think some of us have rather gathered that this arbitrator is to come in as between the parties in dispute without the intervention of anyone. If that had been so there would have been the gravest cause of complaint. Here are two parties, one of whom has a claim against the other, or each have claims against the other, and if the arbitrator, who is called in, has to come in and inquire into the whole complicated case and give his decision, embracing all the different issues, and give no particulars as to how that decision is arrived at, and there is to be no appeal whatever, and no intervention of an expert between him and the parties concerned, there would ensue a condition of things which would probably give rise to very great complaint. But as I read the Bill that is not the case. There are some very important words in the second section, line 8, page 2: "If the landlord and tenant fail to agree." I take those words to mean that arbitration is only to be resorted to when the valuers, who are naturally appointed between the parties in the first instance, and who are experts, have failed to agree with regard to any particular matter mentioned in the schedule, and not necessarily, I may say never, with regard to the whole of the schedule. The Bill further says, "If there is a difference in respect of an improvement." I take that to mean in respect of a particular improvement in regard to which there is a difference of opinion. When there is a difference of opinion under this Bill the parties appoint each his own valuer, and then if the valuers fail to agree upon any particular point the arbitrator is called in and his decision is final upon the matter of fact. That is, as I suppose, on the financial fact of £ s. d., and if that be so there will not be any serious source of complaint, because there will be two experts appointed by the parties themselves. Therefore, instead of not knowing upon what facts the arbitrator took his decision, the facts would be laid before him by the valuers—the experts—of the parties concerned, and the aggrieved party would only have to apply to his own valuer, because he, having laid the case before the arbitrator, must know what points the decision was given upon. If that is so, it brings these cases within the category of those commercial arbitrations, or Lands Clauses Act arbitrations, referred to by the right hon. Gentleman, because in those cases the parties between whom the arbitration is are represented by experts, who lay their case before the arbitrator. And there the arbitrator's decision, as to matters of fact, is final. In regard to matters of law there is an appeal which is exactly similar under the old Act. Under the Lands Clauses Umpire Act of 1883 there were first of all two referees, and then an arbitrator, although I do not know that the advantage was greater because you had three experts instead of one, because if you had two parties concerned in a case of this kind either party if he be cantankerous could drag the other party before an arbitrator, and put him to considerable expense. As a question of landlord and tenant I personally look upon it as a landlord, but I also look at it from the point of view of the farmer, and I feel myself that if my valuer failed to come to an agreement with the valuer of the party who is quitting my land, and a responsible arbitrator was appointed to decide between those two men, and my valuer had a locus standi to put my case before him, I should be quite satisfied with the decision as to matters of fact. As to questions of law it would be different; and as to questions of law and the stating of a case for a superior court, I do not see why agricultural experts should not do the same as is done in commercial arbitrations.

*EARL PERCY: In commercial cases questions of law that are likely to arise are stated at once before the arbitration commences; in agricultural arbitrations they are not so obvious. I cannot see what objection there can be to giving the particulars.

CAPTAIN PRETYMAN: When it comes to stating a case for a superior court, of course particulars must be given, and particulars can be demanded. To take a case to a court of law without any particulars would be a preposterous thing, but I never contemplated that. The point I am dealing with, and it is a point which I think requires an answer, is whether the parties themselves should say whether it was desirable or not that a case should be stated. Where experts are appointed by the parties, they will be of the same class as the arbitrator himself; they have the same knowledge of agricultural law, and I think they would be able to decide for themselves whether there is any necessity to state a case. Therefore we have no reason to fear that a decision will be given by the arbitrator which will be wrong in law, and that neither party will be able to find the point upon which that decision was given, and that the wrong decision will stand. I am bound to say that, although I examined this Bill very carefully, I was very much of the opinion of my noble friend; but having given it further and closer study, I think this Bill will work out very satisfactorily — that very few cases indeed will come forward; the valuers will be able to settle nearly every case, and when they cannot settle a case the appointment of an arbitrator supported by the appeal to the County Court on a question of law will be very satisfactory. There are two other points which were mentioned by my noble friend, which require the careful consideration of the House. The first was in regard to the question of distress. I think we should look very carefully indeed at the distress clause before we interfere with the existing clause in the Act of 1883. It is not a landlord's question, it is a tenant's question, and, as a landlord, I feel very loth to express an opinion upon it; but I hope that this clause will not be pressed. With regard to the question raised by my noble friend with respect to the change in the character of the holding, that should also be looked into very carefully. The broad principle has been laid down in the first schedule of this Bill that where an improvement has anything to do with the cultivation of the farm only it ought to be allowed, but that when it comes to altering the permanent character of the holding the consent of the landlord should be necessary. The three things mentioned by my noble friend—osiers, gardens, and orchards—would distinctly alter the character of the holding, and would require careful consideration by the landlord. It is in itself, perhaps, a small matter, and as it stands I do not think a single landlord would object; but it happens that there is a great principle involved, and whether it is worth while to insert this particular provision to depart from that principle, which is of value now and may be of good use hereafter, is questionable. Therefore I think, for the reasons I have laid before the House, that this Bill when it passes into law will prove satisfactory.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I venture to think that the interpretation which the hon. Member for Woodbridge has put upon this Bill is different from that which is generally put upon it, and I should like to know whether the interpretation which he puts upon Clause 2 is that which the Government puts upon it, because the substance and the character of this Bill will be entirely altered if that interpretation is correct. As I understand it, whenever a case arises where a tenant wants to make a claim, under this Bill an arbitrator is to be at once appointed and give his decision. There is no intermediate stage, as the hon. Gentleman stated, of appointing valuers. The hon. Gentleman accentuated the importance of the interpretation which he placed upon Clause 2, by saying that if his interpretation was correct there would be very little resort to this Bill either by tenants or landlords. I think, therefore, that we ought to have from the right hon. Gentleman a statement as to whether the interpretation of the hon. Member for Woodbridge is correct, and the procedure indicated by him that which it is intended shall be taken under this Bill. I hope the Government will not listen to the arguments urged by the noble Lords.

opposite. First of all as to the form in which the award of the arbitrator is to be given; that is one of the few gains offered to the agricultural community under this Bill, and you do simplify these cases when you say the award shall be given in a lump sum. I also hope the Government will not listen to the arguments urged as to the appeal. As I understand the two noble Lords, they wish to have incorporated not only the question of law but also the question of facts. I think we ought to simplify and cheapen procedure as much as possible; but when you give a right to appeal on a question of fact as well as of law you increase the procedure, and also the cost. The right hon. Gentleman who introduced this Bill said that one of the objects was to simplify and cheapen the procedure, but in my opinion, if he accepts the suggestions of the noble Lords it will have exactly the opposite result.

LORD HUGH CECIL (Greenwich) said that, in all honesty, he thought by the arrangement which had resulted in this Bill being considered at the present time the Government had not displayed very much consideration for their supporters, many of whom had received the impression that the Bill was not to be discussed at so early a date.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): May I ask where the noble Lord obtained that information, and whether it was through the ordinary channels of the House?

LORD HUGH CECIL: I understand so; the information was conveyed to me. I do not suggest any breach of faith, but this is a very inconvenient time to have this debate, and it happens that a great many Members are unable to be in their places on the present occasion. One cannot rid one's self of the suspicion that that was one of the considerations which induced the Government to put down the Bill for to-night.

*MR. LONG: The suggestion is unworthy of the noble Lord, and quite unfounded.

LORD HUGH CECIL did not suggest anything improper or dishonourable on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, but the occasion was inconvenient, and therefore he thought it was necessary to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to consider as favourably as possible the Amendments which came before him, especially on points which, like the one under discussion, were somewhat intricate. Who was to decide what was the proper interpretation of the Act? The hon. Member for Woodbridge took one view, the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire took another. He hoped before the discussion came to a conclusion the Attorney General would advise the House as to what was the proper interpretation. He thought the House would be well advised in inserting words into the Bill which would make the matter plain, as there was certainly no object in passing an ambiguous clause. With regard to the question of appeal, the appeal was resisted on the ground that it would destroy the character and the simplicity which was the great feature of the Bill. He quite agreed that simplicity of procedure was a very good thing, but it might, he thought, be purchased at too high a price. Cheap justice or rough justice, generally meant no justice at all. A similar discussion arose during the passage of the Workmen's Compensation Bill through the House, and a very important Amendment was inserted upon the question of the right to take the master to the Court of Appeal. In that case the Government allowed the House to take its own course, and that Amendment was carried in spite of the arguments brought against it. Then, as now, it was said that the character and simplicity of the Bill would be destroyed, and that artisans would be involved in great expense, but ultimately the Amendment was inserted. It was no doubt essential to have a simple form of doing justice, but the object of such a system was, it must be remembered, to do justice between the parties, and it should be made so plain that the people knew what to expect when they went to law. Probably the most simple system of law and administration the world had ever seen was the system of revolutionary government under the Convention in 1793. Nothing could exceed the simplicity of that procedure under which people could get a decision in an extraordinarily short space of time—cases of a criminal character being disposed of in the space of twenty-four hours. But because the procedure was simple it was not good. Simplicity was apt to be synonymous with a rough and ready system of justice, which was often very unfair. This Bill was one which undoubtedly commanded wide support, but it was impossible not to see, even in the course of the present discussion, that the Bill might be used as a platform for further legislation of a much more objectionable character. The hon. Member for East Northamptonshire frankly said that he regarded the Bill as very faulty. He said it did not go far enough, and he anticipated that in the future legislation must go much further. His right hon. friend the President of the Board of Agriculture had argued as from past precedents, and a similar argument would be applicable to all the precedents set up under this Bill. Therefore they were entitled to consider this Bill most carefully, and he earnestly hoped that the Government, in spite of exhortations coming from the other side, would not shut the door in the face of their own supporters. It was, of course, only too easy for the Government, anxious to pass the Bill, to remember that opponents could give more trouble than supporters, and not to give too much consideration to the merits of the case. He hoped, however, that that would not be the case in regard to the present Bill, and that the Government would decide these questions in accordance with right and justice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): There is one point on which I cannot agree with my noble friend who has just spoken. He said that our opponents could always give more trouble than our supporters. I am not sure that my noble friend has described that matter accurately. I was very glad to hear my noble friend the Member for South Kensington say that this is a good Bill, and that, on the whole, he is anxious that it should pass. I gather that that is the opinion of all the other noble Lords and hon. Members who have spoken. Various points have been raised, but I would remind the House that what we are now asking is that this Bill should be considered, and all these points, of course, will be considered at the proper time and in the proper way. It has been said that the clause with regard to the right of distress goes too far, but the intention of that clause is to carry out what was the object of the Legislature in 1883, and if anyone can say that that intention has not been carried out it will be legitimate ground for considering whether the law should not be amended. There are only one or two points on which I wish to say a word or two at this stage. I shall refer first to the construction of the second section of the Bill—

> "If a tenant claims to be entitled to compensation, whether under the principal Act or this Act, or under custom, agreement, or otherwise, in respect of any improvement comprised in the First Schedule of this Act, and if the landlord and tenant fail to agree as to the amount and time and mode of payment of such compensation, the difference shall be settled by arbitration in accordance with the provisions, if any, in that behalf in any agreement between landlord and tenant, and in default of and subject to any such provisions by arbitration under this Act in accordance with the provisions set out in the Second Schedule to this Act."

Provision is made for raising any question of law which may relate to one of the parties and which may not relate to the other. I quite agree with my hon. friend the Member for the Woodbridge division that landlord and tenant before they rush to arbitration will probably, like sensible Englishmen, take skilled advice, and put their differences in the hands of experts, although, of course, there is no obligation upon them to do so. If they fail to agree, after every facility has been afforded, then, and not till then, they will go to arbitration. The practice hitherto in too many cases has been for the landlord and tenant when they failed to agree each to appoint his arbitrator. The provision now is that if any question of law emerges in the course of the arbitration either party may require the arbitrator to state a case, and if the Judge of the County Court directs that he should do so he is bound to state a case. In the second schedule of the Bill the ninth rule says:

> "The arbitrator may at any stage of the proceedings, and shall, if so directed by the judge of a county court (which direction may be given on the application of either party) state in the form of a special case for the opinion of that court any question of law arising in the course of the arbitration."

I would ask the House whether it is not more convenient, if a question of law arises in the course of an arbitration, that it should be disposed of while the case is pending and before the final award.

Formerly the matter went to award, and from that there was an appeal. I do not think the words in regard to that matter can be made clearer. It is not the intention of the Bill in any way or in the slightest degree to prevent full consideration by the court of any question of law that arises. It would be a question of law whether an improvement was of such a nature that compensation was fair or not under the Act, but with regard to that we desire that the fullest opportunity should be given for the consideration of these questions. The appeal on the question of law is intended to be conserved, and, if any change is necessary to make that clear it can be considered when the Bill is dealt with upon the Report stage.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire): The point in the Bill which we have hitherto been discussing does not seem to me to be nearly so important as the point which originated the discussion—I mean the point raised by the noble Lord opposite, namely, the direction to the arbitrator that he should specify in his award the different heads. He referred to what is done under the Lands Clauses Act, but the case is not at all parallel to the number of different questions which will be raised between landlord and tenant as to the various improvements specified in the Bill. Each separate improvement raises a separate consideration, and it is perfectly reasonable that the parties should be told in which of these points they have succeeded and in which of them they have failed. Moreover, it is considered that many of the arbitrators before whom those questions will come will not be men of any very great experience, and certainly will not have any great amount of practice in deciding upon points on which they have to say yes or no. It will tend very greatly to satisfactory awards if they are tied down to state in each case what the breach of covenant consists in, what the claims consist of, and what the award is in each case. Another question has been raised as to distress. It has been said that this is a tenants' question, but it must not be forgotten that the existence of the right of distress necessarily tends to increase competition for farms, because it enables men with rather less capital to take farms on account of there being a first charge in favour of the landlord for a considerable amount. It is said that to give the right of distress will encourage small holdings. In my opinion it is not likely to have that result, and I speak with very considerable experience in small holdings. My experience is, if a small holder once gets into arrear his case is hopeless, and it is better that there should be no inducement to the landlord to give indulgence. That clause in the Bill should be allowed to stand. Complaints have been made against putting permanent grass and other improvements of that kind in the category of those which in the view of the landlord are not required. There is no doubt that any sensible landlord would assent to the laying down of permanent pasture, and the planting of osier beds, if done reasonably and by a reasonable tenant; but there is still a considerable number of absentee landlords whose estates are managed in a rigid way, not by agents familiar with country affairs, but by London lawyers or agents. On these grounds I hope the Government will consider before we come to the Report stage the suggestion made, and if the noble Lord the Member for Horncastle should press any Amendment in the direction he has indicated certainly I should be very glad to support it.

*MR. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton): I have listened with astonishment to the different views expressed as to the mode of arbitration procedure under Clause 2, and therefore it is very difficult to understand what the procedure will be. The suggestion I am going to make to the Government is this. During the negotiations between this Government and the Transvaal Government before the outbreak of the war, the Transvaal Government introduced a Bill offering to reduce the term of qualification for the franchise to five years for Uitlanders, the Colonial Secretary made the very unique suggestion that the Transvaal Government should appoint a joint Commission to inquire into the working of the law before it came into operation—that is, if the Bill became law. My suggestion is that the Government should try the experiment by suspending this Bill and appointing a Commission to inquire as to how the second clause would work. I believe that suggestion to the Transvaal Government was a unique one, and it would be interesting if the Government would try the experiment on their own particular measures. Members who had listened to the discussion on this side of the House were absolutely in a state of confusion as to what this clause is.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I certainly think it is most proper that this Bill should be considered, and I would suggest respectfully that it should be considered from the point of view of the drafting. My view is that it is the extraordinary method of drafting that has caused much of the confusion that has been apparent during this debate, and to that also is no doubt due the outburst of the noble Lord. It is in consequence of the defects of drafting that the Bill as it stands is the most remarkable example of referential and allusive legislation I have ever come across. As it stands the Bill is an absolute cryptogram, and nobody can possibly approach to an understanding of it until he has provided himself with nine other Acts of Parliament. Without these it is as much a mystery as the hieratic writing of the great Egyptian priests was a mystery to the common people who only understood the common writing. Yet the Act is intended for plain men, and to enable landlords and tenants to understand their positions and relations to each other. The whole suggestion of the Attorney General is that they should make up their minds as to what their powers are, what the justice of the case demands, and then consult an expert. Pass the Bill as it stands, and no landlord or tenant, unless inspired with extra wisdom from on high, will be able to understand what his rights are. I will give an example from the first clause—

"References in the principal Act to the First Schedule to that Act shall be construed as references to the First Schedule to this Act."

At the end of the second clause I find these words—

"Subject to any provision contained in any agreement between landlord and tenant the Arbitration Act, 1889, shall not apply to any arbitration to which this Act applies."

The third clause contains the following—

"Sections twenty-nine, thirty, and thirty-one of the principal Act shall apply to any money paid by or due from a landlord to a tenant as compensation for any improvement comprised in the First Schedule of this Act, whether the compensation be claimed under this Act or under custom or agreement or otherwise."

Mr. Jonathan Samuel.

I do not think anybody can understand that clause without collating all the different Acts. I desire once again to renew the protest I have made many times as to the monstrous abuse perpetrated by one Government after another, perpetrated by one front bench after another, in introducing into the House, and passing by Government majorities, Bills which no human being can understand. It is perfectly outrageous to pass a Bill like this which you cannot understand until you have learned by heart nine other Acts. On a representation being made to the late Government on the subject, when the Behring Sea Bill was before the House, they embodied all the clauses of other Acts to which the Bill itself alluded. That was reasonable. If the Government had done this now, I should not require to make any reference to this matter. Look at this cryptogram in the tenth section—

"References to the principal Act and to Sections 29, 30, 32, and 34 thereof, shall be construed as references to the Agricultural Holdings (Scotland) Act, 1883, and to Sections 24, 26, 25, and 30, thereof, respectively. References to Sections 31 and 39 of the principal Act shall not apply."

One more quotation from the tenth clause—

"A reference to the Arbitration Act, 1899, shall be construed as a reference to the Arbitration (Scotland) Act, 1894, and a reference to the Market Gardeners' Compensation Act, 1895, shall be construed as a reference to the Market Gardeners' Compensation (Scotland) Act, 1897."

Clause 9 contains the following—

"References to 'manures' in the principal Act, and this Act shall be construed as references to the improvements numbered twenty-four, twenty-five, and twenty-six, in Part 3 of the First Schedule to this Act."

You have no right to ask this House to spend its time passing solemn Acts of Parliament to which the Royal Assent should be given, and by which the people of this country should be bound, without giving them some chance of understanding what the law is. Many and many a time in this House I have risen to protest against this system of not saying what you mean. Why do you not say what you mean? Are you ashamed to say it? Do you think the House will not accept it? If either of these reasons were true you ought not to introduce the measure. If you are not ashamed of it, if you do understand it, and if you believe the House will adopt it, in God's name state it in plain language. The landlord has got to try to understand the Act; the tenant has got to try to understand the Act; even the unhappy Court of Arbitration has got to try to understand it. Will you give none of them a chance? Are you determined that nobody should know what it is you put into an Act of Parliament? Do let us once for all come to a resolution to bring to an end this mischievous, false, deceitful, and dishonest system of getting the House of Commons to pass clauses in Acts of Parliament which do not say what they mean, which allude to other Acts of Parliament—and not even to them, but only to them with differences, and differences upon differences, and again differences upon those. It is not creditable to Her Majesty's Government, it is not creditable to the House of Commons, and it is not creditable to the country.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham) was understood to express his entire agreement with the complaint of the last speaker. He had no conception until this discussion of the infinite possibilities which lay within the four corners of the Bill under consideration. Apparently a tenant might be entitled to compensation in five different ways in respect of any of the improvements comprised within the schedule to the Bill, and of those improvements there were thirty-four. Each person was to appoint his expert, and these experts were to sit down and endeavour to agree, but if they could not agree absolutely and entirely the matter was to go before the arbitrator. This was simplicity of procedure; this was shortening the deliberations between landlord and tenant at the expiration of a tenancy. This was deliberately put before the House as a means of simplifying the relations between landlord and tenant. Simplicity indeed! One's mind almost reeled at the contemplation of the possible variety of claims that might be put forward in different ways. He preferred the simplicity of the common law, even before the Common Law Procedure Act. He was greatly in favour of anything which would simplify procedure; but there was one thing more desirable than simplicity, and that was certainty. When they were dealing with a multiplicity of facts such as might reasonably arise under the third schedule of the Bill, what possible objection could there be to the arbitrator giving the amount he had arrived at on each item? That would be much more satisfactory than lumping them together and leaving the parties to discover for themselves the compensation awarded in respect of particular items. He did not very much care whether the Bill passed into law or not, but if it did he hoped it would first be amended in several material particulars.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.): I have no doubt the Attorney General will suggest that I am somewhat obtuse, but up to the present I have failed to understand the position of Clause 3 and Clause 2. I propose to deal with Clause 3 first. Under that clause the powers of the County Court are to be exercised by the Board of Agriculture, "and 'the Board of Agriculture' accordingly should be substituted for 'County Court' in Sections 29, 30, 31, 32, and 39 of that Act." What I want to understand is how that inquiry is to be dealt with, whether locally, or whether the Board of Agriculture will have a court in London to deal with these questions. While I have every confidence in the President of the Board of Agriculture, I am perfectly confident that, from a legal point of view, that will not prove a satisfactory tribunal, because its decisions will not be properly reviewed by the courts of law. I do not pose as an expert in agricultural holdings, but I do claim to have some knowledge of arbitrations and proceedings in County Courts, and I must say that if there is one way more unsatisfactory than another of obtaining decisions on points of law it is by reference to a County Court. I will give my reasons for that view. In London alone, with which I am more familiar, on the question of the Workmen's Compensation Act, there are two or three County Court Judges who entertain contrary opinions upon particular points in that Act, and one may be fairly clear as to what a variety of decisions there will be if the opinion of County Court Judges is to be taken on these points of law. I venture to say that what the Act of Uniformity deals with in the preface to the Book of Common Prayer about the uses of Sarum, Hereford, and Bangor will certainly be illustrated by a greater number of decisions of, say, the County Courts of Essex, Hereford, or Cornwall. If points of law arise in regard to the wording of any new Act, the proper and only way of securing simplicity and expedition is by referring that point of law not to the County Court of the district, but to the Court of Queen's Bench, and from there, if necessary, to the Court of Appeal. I am astonished that the Attorney General should be satisfied with the suggestion that these arbitrators, these expert persons with every knowledge of agriculture but none of law, should be permitted to state a case. To state a case for a Superior Court is a work of great difficulty. It has to be drawn first by one side, then approved by the other, and finally approved by the person from whose decision the appeal is to be made. What sort of a case will be stated by the ordinary arbitrators in an agricultural district, and in what condition will that case find itself when it goes before the County Court Judge? There is another point to which I should like to draw attention. I am perfectly confident that this House ought not to sanction the abrogration of that portion which under Clause 19 of the old Act of 1883 made it absolutely necessary for the arbitrator to give each of his findings under a specific heading. It has been said that in arbitrations which take place under the ordinary rules of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act, or in arbitrations which arise in connection with public improvements, the arbitrator does not give a specific amount under each head of the claim. But if desired the arbitrator, especially if he is not a legal person, always gives those particulars if he is asked to do so by either of the parties to the inquiry. If the law is to be altered, let it be altered with some probability of the law being ascertained not only in a simple and speedy way, but in a satisfactory way. Then, Sir, why should not Sub-section 3 apply to Scotland? I see later on that no portion of the Bill is to apply to Ireland, but I cannot understand why Sub-section 3 is not to apply to Scotland, while it applies to England. The Bill is a most unsatisfactory one in the way in which it deals with other Acts—in citing, repealing, or incorporating them. One of the most painstaking members of the Court of Appeal, Lord Justice Smith, has complained over and over again of the manner in which Parliament throws at the Judges these Acts with references to a number of other Acts without specifically setting them out. It is not fair to the public, and it is not fair to Her Majesty's Judges. The only thing it does is to make the position of the law utterly impossible for an ordinary person to grasp, and to suggest that an ordinary County Court Judge is to decide points of law under Sub-sections 9 and 10 is a suggestion which might be very well for a political meeting, but it is not worthy of the common-sense or deliberation of this House. I trust that if this Bill is to be persevered with Her Majesty's Government will endeavour to remedy the defects which different hon. Members have pointed out, and which I humbly suggest might be dealt with in a more satisfactory, and certainly in a less complicated, way than they are at present.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): I should like to add one word to what has been said with so much point by the hon. Member for King's Lynn, and that is to renew the protest made at an earlier stage of this Bill against the infringement of the principle which has hitherto been observed in this class of legislation of bringing in separate Bills to deal with the case of Scotland. Much of the complexity to which the hon. Member for King's Lynn alluded is traceable to the fact that instead of having a Scotch Bill amending former Scotch Acts dealing with this question, we have our legislation coupled with English legislation on the same subject. I simply wish to renew the complaint with as much emphasis as I can that we have not got legislation more intelligible to the Scotch farmer and more in accordance with Scotch precedent on this question.

Question put, and agreed to.

*MR. CHANNING: I do not know whether I shall be in order in moving the clause put down by my hon. and gallant friend the Member for Stratford-upon-Avon.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot move the Amendment of another hon. Member; he can move his own.

*MR. CHANNING: Then I will move my own. I will only say it was my intention when I put it down to put it down with the slight alteration made by the hon. Member for Stratford-upon-Avon in his draft. As it is, I hope, if the House agrees to the Second Reading, that it will be amended in the sense of my hon. and gallant friend. I do not know that this clause needs many words to recommend it to those who have followed the discussion of this question. The matter was brought before the Royal Commission by nearly every practical witness who went into this question. One of the objections raised to this proposal by the President of the Board of Agriculture was the question of expense. My hon. and gallant friend the Member for Stratford-upon-Avon has received several letters from practical valuers of position in the Midland counties dealing with this question of expense, and I would ask to be permitted to read them to the House. One of these letters is in reply to Colonel Milward, and is as follows—

"In reply to yours of the 18th inst. my own opinion is that the records of farms can be taken at the time the valuation is made, that the charge should be £2 2s. for 100 acres, £3 3s. for 200 acres, £4 4s. for 400 acres, and so on. This would not be a great charge; you can say a minimum charge of £2 2s., and £1 for every 100 acres after the first 100."

Another letter from a Warwickshire valuer says—

"I wired you this morning 'Charges for 100 acres two guineas, 300 acres four guineas.' I do not consider the fee named should prevent its being carried, as such a procedure must be mutual to landlord and tenant. I have not consulted any other valuers as to fees; these are my ideas only."

Then from a Worcestershire valuer—

"I have no doubt valuers will be found who will survey holdings on the fees you mention. I should say, in most cases, it will be done by the landlord or his agent and the incoming tenant themselves. If the Act is passed I should make it part of the terms of letting a farm in our agency that we agree on a statement as to present state of cultivation, etc."

The next is from a Hereford valuer—

"Thanks very much for the Agricultural Holdings Act and Amendments. I have carefully read them through, and I think your clause as regards a record of the condition of the holding a most important and necessary addition. I have for some years on one estate been in the habit of noting in the agreement the state of cultivation at time of entry, which I have found most useful. I also number their gates on the plan, and keep note of what is done to them by a new tenant. It is on very few properties that I have had to do with that any sort of record of cultivation is made, and I think it would save very much trouble to arbitrators and save endless disputes if such a proceeding was made compulsory. As to the fees you name, I think they are reasonable and fair. It is so often said by tenants, 'When I entered my hedges were not trimmed, my ditches were all blocked up, the house drainage was choked, the pump was practically worn out, the boilers were cracked.' After a man has been in a farm twelve or fifteen years it is forgotten, if ever noted, what a farm was like, and if such a record as you propose is made compulsory, and is to form part of the agreement it will be a grand thing for all concerned."

He then gives a schedule showing how he would propose to carry out his idea. I thought, as my hon. and gallant friend furnished me with these letters, I might lay them before the House as practical evidence in support of this clause. My own view has always been that it was a proposal as to the practical machinery of which we should consult and rely upon the opinions of practical men. It seems to me that it will be of the greatest possible advantage to the valuer to have some such record. I think, as has been mentioned in one of the letters I have read, the matter could be dealt with in a very short and clear form, and would certainly lead to the elimination of many causes of dispute between landlord and tenant, because the details could be easily comprehended by both parties, and disputes could be settled reasonably and amicably. This mode of procedure can be carried out without entailing extravagant expenditure on either party, and would be a valuable addition to the Bill. I hope, therefore, Her Majesty's Government will see their way to accept this clause.

New clause—

"Every contract of tenancy entered into after the commencement of this Act shall contain a scheduled record of the agricultural condition of the holding and its several parts, and of the buildings, fences, roads, and drains at the beginning of the contract of tenancy. At any time during a tenancy existing at the commencement of this Act, either party may require a record in similar form to be made by an arbitrator. Copies of all such records shall be deposited in the office of the registrar of the county court, and either party shall be entitled to inspect the same at all reasonable times, and to take copies thereof."—(Mr. Channing.)

—brought up and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

*MR. LONG: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not think it necessary to press his Amendment, because there is really no such agreement among us as he imagines, even as to the theoretical advantages which would arise from a system of this kind. The question which will present itself to every hon. Member is whether it is just to make such a record compulsory on the landlord and the tenant. Whatever such a record would cost—whether the expense would be small, as the hon. Gentleman suggests, or whether it would be large—it would have to be borne not only by the party requiring it, but also by the other. I can conceive that a record carefully and exhaustively made would be of some value, but I confess I heard with surprise the hon. Gentleman's statement that the cost would only be £2 2s. per hundred acres. That strikes me as a very moderate charge if the work is efficiently done, but it seems to me rather a loose way of describing the charge likely to be made. A great deal would depend of course on whether the hundred acres were lying together, or were in separate lots, or if they were composed of the same kind of land or not. Then, again, two guineas may be a reasonable charge for a hundred acres, but if the same amount were charged for thirty acres or forty acres it would, I submit, not be a reasonable charge, and if reasonable in one case it would be excessive in the other. There is nothing to prevent either the landlord or the tenant having a record made; but, without knowing either the form of the record or its cost, I think it would not be desirable to make it compulsory, and under these circumstances I hope the House will not assent to the clause.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: I hope my hon. friend will press this clause, as it seems to me an extremely valuable one. The objections of the President of the Board of Agriculture are more objections in Committee than objections on the Second Reading. If this Bill is going to be valuable at all it will only be so because it lays down a model form of agreement between landlord and tenant, and if anything tends more effectively than another to soothe the feelings between landlord and tenant at the termination of a tenancy, it is that there should be as few disputes as possible on the question of compensation. In nine cases out of ten the tenancy has lasted for a great number of years. The tenant will tell you that when he went into the farm it was in a state of general neglect, that the fences were broken down and the drains choked up. Then, on the other hand, the landlord will be equally convinced that the farm was in a thoroughly satisfactory condition when the tenant entered it, and who, in the circumstances, can decide between them? The establishment of a record of this kind has the approval of very many eminent agriculturists. I may mention that many years ago it was warmly advocated by a man whom many hon. Members will remember, Mr. Albert Pell, who was one of the most practical agriculturists of this generation. He went even so far as to suggest photographs to show the condition of the fences, but that is a counsel of perfection which I certainly should not care to insist upon. At all events, a record as to the condition of a farm when a tenant enters it can be easily and, I venture to say, cheaply made. In a farm of any considerable size it would be made as a matter of course by the agents and the incoming tenant. As a matter of fact they do now go over the farms in most cases, and the landlord or the agent tells the tenant what he is prepared to do. Where would be the difficulty in putting such a statement into the form of a record, with a few additional particulars regarding the condition of the fences, roads, drains, etc.? I am convinced that the adoption of this clause will tend very greatly to improve the working of the Bill, and I heartily support it.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY: If Her Majesty's Government make no concession on the point I raised at the beginning of the discussion, namely, that the arbitrator should give details of his award, I certainly shall vote with the hon. Gentleman. At present, in many cases, when a tenant gives up his farm the arbitrator decides the amount to be paid to the landlord for dilapidation or waste, and that money is expended in repairing the holding and the farm house. It is impossible for anyone to learn in what state the holding was left by the outgoing tenant, unless it be plainly stated by the arbitrator on what grounds his arbitration is based. Unless some concession is given on this point, I shall certainly support the clause.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I trust my hon. friend will press this clause. The present method of ascertaining the condition of a holding seems to me to be extremely unsatisfactory, and to be done in a merely mechanical manner. What the farmer wants is that the farm should be judged by its general condition and by its fertility, which depends on continuous good husbandry. That is a very delicate matter to decide, and after a period of years it is almost impossible to ascertain what was the condition of the farm when the tenant went into it. This Amendment will be not only useful but also economical, because it will prevent disputes. The right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill objects to this clause because it is obligatory, but my hon. friend has stated that he will be willing to accept the wording of the clause which stands first on the Paper, and which is entirely permissive, leaving the tenant to ask for a record or not as he likes. Of course, if he asks for it he will have to pay for it. That would get rid not only of the objection that the clause is obligatory, but also of the objection with regard to the cost. The difficulty is that almost all valuers are regarded as either landlords' men or tenants' men, and what we want is impartial men appointed as permanent officials who would be very careful not to lean either to one side or the other. The fee should be a moderate one, and a very small payment would enable this valuable record to be made.

*SIR JOHN KINLOCH (Perthshire, E.) thought that this clause was quite unnecessary. It was a clause to defend landlords. They, the landlords, were perfectly able to defend themselves. In all their leases the objects of this clause were taken notice of except the agricultural condition of the holding. The criterion by which they could judge that was the sum paid to the outgoing tenant for compensation. All the other things, such as buildings and drains, were guarded in the lease. From the tenants' point of view, it would be most objectionable to have a fussy landlord or factor coming in every year to make a record.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE pointed out that in this clause no provision was made as to who was to make this scheduled record, and there was nothing as to who should pay for it. The parties might not be able to agree, and no provision was made for a third party. The tenant had ample opportunities of looking into all the matters raised by this clause, and of gauging the agricultural condition of his holding and of seeing what the conditions of the buildings were. The clause provided that—

> "At any time during a tenancy existing at the commencement of this Act, either party may require a record in similar form to be made by an arbitrator."

There was no suggestion there as to who was to appoint the arbitrator or who was to pay him. He did not think this matter had been sufficiently considered by the hon. Member who moved the clause. He certainly thought that the clause as drafted was absolutely unworkable, and would operate to the disadvantage both of the landlord and the tenant.

DISTRICT COUNCILLORS AND GUARDIANS (TERM OF OFFICE) BILL.

[SECOND READING]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF YARBOROUGH: My Lords, when the district councils were created it was enacted that one-third of the councillors should vacate office annually; but power was given to the county council, on the request of any district council, to vary this procedure and to require that all the councillors should vacate office simultaneously every third year. No power, however, was given to the county council to rescind this order should the district council wish to return to the normal procedure. This case has arisen at Woodbridge in Suffolk, and the Law Officers of the Crown have ruled that a Bill is necessary to remedy the omission. This Bill has passed the other House without opposition; it has not been opposed by the Local Government Board; and therefore I ask your Lordships to give it a Second Reading.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD: In the absence of my noble friend Lord Harris, I am asked to say that the Local Government Board approve of this Bill, as representing a practical way of getting over the difficulty to which the noble Earl has referred.

Bill read 2ª (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

Then it was moved that a Committee of Five Lords be appointed to join with a Committee of the House of Commons to consider the constitution of Queen Anne's Bounty Board, and to report whether economy and efficiency of administration would be promoted by any change in its constitution or by its amalgamation with any other body; agreed to.

Then a Message was ordered to be sent to the House of Commons, in answer to their said Message, to inform them of the appointment of the said Committee by this House.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVILEGE—NOTICES OF QUESTIONS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I wish to ask your kind attention, Mr. Speaker, to a matter which I think affects the privileges of Members of this House. Yesterday I gave notice that to-day I would repeat a question I had on the Paper with regard to the capture of the Derbyshire Regiment, a question which the Under Secretary for War, in my opinion, had not answered. I expected that, as a matter of course, after I had given notice across the floor of the House, it would appear among to-day's questions, but it does not do so. I wish to know if the omission is made by your direction or if it is the act of the clerks, from whom I have always received so much courtesy. If it has been done after consulting you, I think I should have been communicated with.

*MR. SPEAKER: I think it may save time if I at once state that the hon. Member was understood simply to have given notice that he would put the question some other day. The Clerk at the Table consulted me, and as he said that no notice had been given by the hon. Member to put the question down for the next day, I directed to wait until fresh instructions were given. I understood also that the Under Secretary for War thought he had answered the question, in which case it should not be put down again.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: It must have been my fault for not speaking distinctly. I certainly did give the notice. I hope the hon. and learned Gentleman, however, will now put the question down for Thursday.

*MR. SPEAKER: That shall be done if the hon. Member thinks the question has not been answered.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Certainly I consider it has not been answered.

ELECTRIC LIGHTING PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 11) BILL. (BY ORDER.)

Order for Second Reading read.

*CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): In moving the rejection of this Bill, I desire to say that I do so not only by the special request of the vestry of the important parish affected by it—Marylebone—but also by the wish of other public authorities in London, and especially of the parish a portion of which I have the honour to represent in this House. I make this statement in order to show that this is no narrow issue as between the parish of Marylebone and a certain electric lighting company, but that it is a matter which affects important parishes throughout this immense and thickly-populated area of the county of London. This Bill comes forward at a most inopportune moment, inasmuch as it is on the eve not of the creation, but of the coming into being of the great London boroughs on the 1st November next. It will be a matter of the gravest concern to every one of these great areas if at this moment the parish of Marylebone is to be placed in the position that a second electric lighting company is to be brought into competition with the existing company, with the result that the new borough authority, when it comes into existence, will either have to forego for many years the right and power to supply its own electric light, or will have to buy out at enormous cost the two companies. This is in no sense a party matter, and I believe I am justified in saying that the President of the Board of Trade has left it an open question, and that he desires the House itself to settle the issue. Neither is it a question of municipal trading, inasmuch as from time immemorial it has been deemed to be one of the primary duties of local bodies to control the lighting of the area for the management of which they are responsible. Seeing that the formation of these new metropolitan boroughs was carried in this House by a majority of the votes of hon. Gentlemen opposite, and in opposition to the wishes of many on this side, I would point out to those who desire to treat this as a party question that if they pass this measure they will practically be handicapping and weighting the horse that they themselves have backed. It is of the first importance that these new borough councils should have a fair field. They were created with the express purpose of bringing new municipal life into the administration of the great areas throughout the metropolis, and with a view of encouraging men of a superior class to join the local bodies. So far as the borough of Marylebone is concerned the new borough council will be practically identical with the present district, and by passing this Bill you will be placing it in a position in which it will be unable to deal effectively with the electric lighting of its area. I wish to be perfectly fair to the House in this matter. I have no intention of attempting to make a lawyer-like speech, but I will be perfectly frank, and give a plain statement of what has occurred. I will do absolute justice not only to the company which is promoting this Bill, but also to the company which now has possession of the electric lighting of Marylebone. I frankly acknowledge that the vestry have been at fault. In the year 1889 it allowed the Metropolitan Company to provide electric light, in view of the reserve powers granted to them by the Acts of 1882 and 1888, and having in view the risks, seeing that electric lighting was not in the advanced stage it has now reached, and it was, consequently, a highly speculative matter. The vestry, bearing in view those facts, agreed to forego the power which they might have obtained themselves to supply the electricity, and allowed the Metropolitan Company to undertake the duty. For a certain time the company did the work fairly well, but eventually, owing to the fact that the demand for the light in this great and rich parish enormously increased, the company became unable to give complete satisfaction to the inhabitants of the district. They were, moreover, handicapped by the fact that they were building a large generating station at Willesden. Some years later the vestry, overwhelmed to some extent by complaints from the inhabitants of the parish, applied for an Order to enable it to supply the electric light, and at the same time two other companies made a similar application, one of them being the company which is promoting the present Bill. What happened? The Board of Trade granted the Order, but left it to the House to decide whether or not the vestry should be allowed to compete with the existing company. The House—very fairly, as I think—decided in favour of the Metropolitan company, inasmuch as that company had borne the toil and heat of the day. It had entered on a risky undertaking, and, up to a certain period, had given satisfaction. Some years later the vestry applied again for an Order, and again failed, and it then brought in a private Bill with a view to buying up the Metropolitan Company, either voluntarily or compulsorily. The company opposed that, and the House of Commons again decided against the vestry and in favour of the company. What has happened now? The vestry have once more decided to apply for a Provisional Order, more especially in view of the fact that they are soon to be constituted a borough council. But, at the same time, another electric lighting company, which is identical with the St. James's Lighting Company—perhaps one of the best electric lighting companies in the metropolis—is also attempting to get a footing in the parish of Marylebone, and if it does so the local authority will eventually be obliged to buy it out at enormous cost. What does the company urge in favour of its scheme? I have here the document in which they put forward their claim to support. They point to the fact that in 1889 the vestry adopted a report of its Parliamentry Committee, stating that, "in the belief of the Committee, competition between two companies would be beneficial to the parishioners." No doubt, at that time, when the vestry were being harassed by complaints of the inefficiency of the supply, they did believe that competition would be a good thing. Then the promoters go on to point out that at a meeting held at the Board of Trade on the 21st March, 1900, to consider the grant of the present Order, counsel for the vestry stated that "the vestry has always been in favour of competition in this parish, and they are still in favour of it." But what is the reply of the President of the Board of Trade, at the close of his remarks when he received the deputation in January? He said he thought the deputation would have "done some good in ventilating the subject, and in showing how burdensome the present state of things was, and how necessary it was that a remedy should be found." Well, that remedy has been found in a provisional agreement which has been come to between the representatives of the vestry and of the Metropolitan Company, to buy out the latter, and, therefore, whatever there may have been in the statement that the vestry favoured competition, that statement now counts for nothing. I notice in this document from which I have been quoting there is a statement, made prominent by the fact of its being printed in red ink, to the following effect —

"It is stated that since the notice of objection to the Second Reading was given a committee of the vestry have made a provisional agreement with the Metropolitan Company for the purchase of the undertaking of the latter company within the parish at an enhanced price. Neither party having the necessary powers to make such an agreement, it is ultra vires, and cannot be binding upon either party."

We know it cannot, but the vestry have done all that they can do by entering into this provisional agreement. I may further add that the existing Metropolitan Company, which formerly opposed this measure, distinctly contradicts the statement I have read, and says it can be disproved by a reference to the Parliamentary Paper (Electric Lighting, Metropolis) (No. 189). The true position of the matter is stated in the Parliamentary Paper of 1889 (page 9) as follows—

"The Marylebone authorities object to more than one company having powers in their district, and have entered into agreements with the Metropolitan Company."

Seeing that this agreement has been entered into, and seeing also that the company which has a real status in the parish is at one with the vestry, I think I am justified in saying that it would be directly against the interests of the community to allow a second company to come in—a company which could not compete, a company which would never be in a position to compete, and which would do nothing more than thwart the efforts of the new borough council to do its duty, and which would ultimately force that borough council to buy it out at a heavy cost. I may further state that the vestry has not only petitioned Parliament against this Bill, but it is prepared to oppose it at every stage. If you pass this Bill the new borough council will not be able, like some of its neighbours, to supply the electric current at something like 3d. per unit, and private householders will have to pay probably 6d. per unit, and business premises 5d., while the parish itself will have to go on paying £30 per lamp instead of being able to supply its own lamps at a cost of £20 each per year, as is done in the adjacent parish of St. Pancras. By passing this Bill you will be depriving the ratepayers of Marylebone of the opportunity of getting better and cheaper facilities for lighting; you will deprive them also of the opportunity of making a profit which could go to the reduction of rates; and, furthermore, you will be bringing in a new authority to tear up the streets of the parish. You must remember that Oxford Street and Marylebone Road both pass through this parish. In one year Oxford Street was opened up 178 and Marylebone Road 111 times. Is it not monstrous you should bring in another company to tear up these streets, to the great detriment not only of the inhabitants of the parish, but of the trade and of the entire community, causing as it does so much inconvenience and loss to the residents and the public? Finally, may I point out that if you pass this Bill you will be stultifying yourselves? This House has passed a measure creating borough councils throughout the metropolis, and at the beginning you are going to stab one of them in the back by preventing it performing one of its most important duties—namely, dealing with the lighting of the parish. By so acting you are taking a distinctly retrograde step in the matter of local government, and at the same time you will be doing a great injustice to the inhabitants of a large and important parish. I beg to move that this Bill be read a second time this day three months.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): I rise to second the motion. I do not propose to go over the ground so well covered by my hon. and gallant friend opposite. I simply stand here as a representative of a metropolitan and municipal authority, which feels that if this privilege is given to a private company in the case of Marylebone it will be given in the case of other municipalities, and that private companies, against the wishes of the local authorities, will be enabled to furnish what it is claimed it would be an advantage to the inhabitants of a municipality to have supplied by the local authority. Twelve years ago the Metropolitan Company was permitted, with the consent of the vestry, to furnish electric light to the parish. But the work has not been done satisfactorily; indeed, matters became so unsatisfactory that the vestry decided to avail itself of their reserve right to instal the light themselves. It accordingly applied for a Provisional Order, but some difficulty arose in regard to it, and Parliament refused it the power to instal, the House taking the view that when certain individuals had invested their money in furnishing what they believed to be a convenience to the inhabitants, no competition should be permitted. Yet, although competition by a local authority was forbidden, the House is now asked to allow competition by another private company. The parish says, and with absolute truth, that sooner or later this electric service must be furnished by the municipality itself, and when the local authority does take it over, instead of having only one company to buy out there will, if this Bill is allowed to pass, be two companies to be bought up. No doubt competition is a very good thing in the right place, but if it means that there must, in consequence of it, be a large addition to the rates, then the ratepayers are certainly not prepared to accept a proposal entailing such a liability. People who live in adjoining parishes realise that this is the thin edge of the wedge, and that what is made to apply to Marylebone to-day will be applied to other vestries to-morrow. Only to-day the vestry to which I have the honour to belong passed a resolution urging that this Bill should be opposed in every possible way. The President of the Board of Trade, in a debate on an exactly similar question a short time ago, said the House should always support municipality. Well, I ask the House to take that course to-day. The President of the Local Government Board has also laid it down as a general principle that when a municipality and a private company were applying for the same thing the preference should be given to the municipality. Now, what is the position here? Marylebone has applied for and been refused permission to instal, but it intends to again come to the House for power to supply its own electric light, as well as to buy out the existing company. In the meantime you are asked by this Bill to allow a private company to come in and establish itself. I venture to suggest that if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board meant what he said the other day he will support the opposition to this Bill. Again, the right hon. Gentleman said——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. and gallant Gentleman is not in order in discussing a speech made on a different occasion and on another subject, in the present session.

GENERAL LAURIE: I am sorry to have transgressed the rules of the House. I only desired to express my hope that the views uttered by the right hon. Gentleman not very long ago are still held by him. I would also like to point out that, after all, the person to be chiefly considered is not the municipal authority or the commercial company, but the consumer. If I understand aright, the consumer and the ratepayer are very nearly identical persons, and as a ratepayer I would point out that he, after all, is the proper person to deal with this subject, because he has, every now and then, the means of turning out his elected representatives on the local authority if they do not do their duty, whereas, if the lighting is in the hands of a private company he has no control whatever over the directors. The parish to which I belong is spending over £100,000 in laying new pavements, and what is our experience of private companies? We have asked a company which has legislative power to break up our streets to do what work they require before we repave them, and their reply has been that they intend to use their powers when they like. How much better would it be for work of this sort to be done by the municipality itself, instead of allowing a private company to do all sort of mischief by breaking up the streets and destroying the value of work done with the ratepayers' money. I hope that the House will not accept this Bill, but will postpone consideration of it until such time as the borough councils themselves have been created, and the ratepayers are in a position to express their views upon the subject.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Captain Norton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): I will endeavour to put before the House the dry facts of the case, which lie to a great extent in a nutshell. This is a Bill which proposes to confirm a Provisional Order, and I only desire to say, in the first place, that in issuing these Orders the Board of Trade acts with a view to giving the House an opportunity of judging whether or not the Orders should be converted into law. The position in regard to this matter is this. The supply of electric light in Marylebone has been bad for some years past and has been greatly complained of. It therefore became necessary that something tangible should be done to remedy the existing state of things. Two years ago the Vestry of Marylebone applied to the Board of Trade for a Provisional Order to provide a supply in competition with the existing company. Having regard to the state of affairs we did not hesitate for a moment to grant it, but it gave rise to considerable discussion. It was contended that it would have been unfair to the existing company to put it in competition with a rate-aided authority. However, the House agreed to read the Bill a second time, although later on the Committee rejected it, mainly, I believe, on the ground that rate-aided competition would be unfair to the company. Subsequently an important deputation, including many of the leading inhabitants, waited on the Board of Trade complaining of the quality of the light. Eminent doctors declared that it was impossible to carry on operations in consequence of the bad light; shopkeepers also complained, and the conductors of places of worship declared that they could not carry on their devotions—they wanted more light. The deputation seemed to think that the Board of Trade had some means of putting these wrongs right, but, as a matter of fact, I had to explain that the Board of Trade was practically powerless, and that the only remedy for a grievance of this kind is to be found in competition. That is the real way in which existing evils, both in regard to price and quality, can be remedied. But the application of the vestry for a Provisional Order having been refused, is this House now to say that there shall be no remedy until some future time, when a new municipal authority has been created? The House must decide this question for itself. I have sympathy with the position of the vestry, but I must point out that, having already been refused power, they have not put in a fresh application. The hon. Gentleman says they have agreed with the existing company to purchase its undertaking, and that if it is carried out the vestry will then have the matter in its own hands. But I understand that that agreement requires ratification, and that it has not been definitely assented to by either side. If the House reads this Bill a second time I propose to move an Instruction to the Committee in order to safeguard the interests of the vestry in regard to any agreement which it may conclude. I shall propose that it be an Instruction to the Committee to consider the expediency of inserting a clause in the Order, providing that the Order shall not come into operation until a date to be decided by the Committee, and shall not then come into operation if the undertaking authorised by the Metropolitan Electric Supply Company (West London Order, 1899) shall have been purchased by the vestry of Marylebone or their successors. If the House passes the Second Reading, together with this Instruction, the Committee will then be able to consider the position of the vestry in regard to this agreement. I hope that, having regard to the undoubted fact that the supply of the electric light is defective, and that the vestry have been refused power to instal, the House will not relegate this matter again to the position in which it was six months ago, but that it will send the Bill to a Committee to consider all the questions raised by it.

MR. CRIPPS (Gloucestershire, Stroud) only wanted to say one or two words as to the proper principle of dealing with matters of this kind. He hoped that the House would not give a Second Reading to this Bill. The facts were very simple. They already had a company in possession of the parish, and they had a vestry or municipal authority desirous of taking the lighting of the district into its own hands. Between the company and the vestry there was a provisional agreement, and they might take it for granted that if this Bill were thrown out that agreement would be carried into effect. Was it right, then, to introduce another company which the vestry would eventually have to buy out? As they knew, he was an opponent of municipal trading, but this was not a question of municipal trading at all, for the House had long recognised the principle that, where a local authority asked for powers to buy out an existing company, in order that it might itself supply the light, such power ought to be granted it. He did not believe any case could be quoted where it had been refused. When the vestry asked for power to compete with the existing company a totally different set of conditions arose, and it was felt by the House that the company should not be subjected to a rate-aided competition. If this Bill were carried they would have two authorities interfering with the streets, which was an unmitigated nuisance, and when the time for purchase came they would have two companies to buy out instead of one.

MR. LYTTELTON (Warwick and Leamington) hoped that the House would give the Bill a Second Reading. Was it fair that, because a local authority had intimated that some time or other it would light its own district, private enterprise should be refused even a hearing before a Committee of that House? He regretted that, after the offer of the President of the Board of Trade to move an Instruction which would practically safeguard the interests of the local authority, the opposition to the Bill was being persisted in. The hon. and gallant Gentleman who moved its rejection had admitted that the promoters of this Bill were men of excellent position in the electric lighting world, and that they had an excellent record in London. It was admitted, too, that so far back as 1897 the vestry desired competition. So bad was the electric lighting that the vestry itself came to Parliament for a Provisional Order, but the House very properly declined to give a rate-aided authority power to compete with the Metropolitan Company. How had the situation changed? The opponents of this Bill said that it had changed because the vestry had entered into a provisional agreement to purchase the undertaking of the Metropolitan Company. He understands that that was not the fact. The vestry had never passed any such resolution at all. It was passed by a committee of the vestry against a powerful minority, and there were considerable obstacles to the carrying out of the agreement. In the first place the shareholders of the Metropolitan Company had to be asked for their consent. Next, Parliament had to approve the bargain, and finally the electors of the parish of Marylebone would have to ratify it, and he did not believe that that ratification was by any means assured, in view of the strong minority which opposed the passing of the resolution. He did not say it was not a bonâ fide agreement; it was a mere intention to agree, with many obstacles in the way. The shareholders of the Metropolitan Company had to be dealt with; the electors of the new borough council had to be converted, and so also had that body when elected. He did not say the vestry might not be so fortunate as to get Parliament to reverse its decision of 1898, and convert the electors in November next. The Amendment in effect said, "Notwithstanding all these obstacles in the way, you, the ratepayers and inhabitants of Marylebone, are to remain in a condition, as regards electric lighting, which everyone admits to be deplorable, or at any rate very undesirable." What did the proposal of the President of the Board of Trade amount to? That the State should guarantee the rights of the vestry if they were in earnest and successful in carrying out the bargain which they had made provisionally with the Metropolitan Electric Supply Company; and on the vestry being able to purchase the existing undertaking, the operation of this Bill should be postponed. What more reasonable, rational, and temperate proposal could be made? He submitted that the refusal of such an offer as that guaranteed by the Instruction to the Committee, threw a very considerable light on the ability of the vestry to carry out their declared intentions.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Captain Norton and General Laurie.

Words added.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Second Reading put off for three months.

GAS ORDER CONFIRMATION (No. 2) BILL [Lords]. (BY ORDER.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. DOOGAN (Tyrone, E.) moved that the Bill be read a second time this day three months. He said that if the Provisional Order was confirmed it would confer a monopoly on the Dungannon Gas Company, to the great loss of the people of that town. The local authority of Dungannon, up to the 1st April last, was a board of town commissioners constituted under an old Act, the 9th of George IV., whereby special privileges of rating were given to the occupiers of that town. The board of guardians was the sanitary authority, and the sanitary and water rates were paid half by the landlord and half by the tenant. If the town commissioners had before 1st April last obtained powers to provide a gas scheme, the incidence of rating would have been altered, and the payment of rates would have fallen altogether on the tenant, entailing a loss of £540 per annum, a loss which would have more than counterbalanced any gain to be derived from the possession of gas works. The passing of the Local Government (Ireland) Act of 1898 had, however, changed that position. It enabled the town commissioners to apply to the Local Government Board to be constituted an urban council and sanitary board with all the powers conferred upon them by the Local Government Act. The gas company, knowing that the Dungannon council would now enter into competition with them under the provisions of the Act of 1854 which they could do without any practical change in their rating system, determined to forestall the council, and prevent them exercising their new power, had applied for this Provisional Order, which if confirmed would give them the statutory right to break up the streets, and exclude the local authority from supplying gas in the interests of the ratepayers. During the whole of their existence the gas company never before applied for a Provisional Order, and never had the power to break up the streets, but this Bill, if passed, would give them that power, and also enable them to sell their undertaking to the people of Dungannon at an enormous profit. This was a Bill to create a monopoly in the hands of a private company which had been paying a dividend of 10 per cent. for sixteen years. They had charged 5s. 10d. per 1,000 feet of gas, a price much higher than in any neighbouring town in the county of Tyrone. The price in Strabane is 4s. 2d.; in Omagh, 4s. 7d.; Corkstown, 4s. 7d; the price in Armagh is 3s. 4d., and in the adjoining county, Portadown, 3s. 9d. In no Ulster town is the price so high as it is in Dungannon. If the Bill passed there was no prospect of the gas company ever lessening the present price, and they would continue to make an enormous profit out of the people of Dungannon. The company started with a capital of £3,000—600 £5 shares. Afterwards the company made a call of £2 on their shareholders, which increased the capital to £4,200. So far as he could ascertain that was all the additional capital the shareholders had ever paid into the company. But the capital was nominally raised in 1880 to £6,000, on which constantly a dividend of 10 per cent. had been paid since for sixteen years. Another inflation of the capital had been made a short time before the company sought this Provisional Order. A new company was formed, and at one stroke the capital was raised from £6,000 to £9,000, without a penny being paid; but the new company was nothing but the old company, which merely raised their shares from £10 to £15, and had themselves registered a new company. The transaction was the very embodiment of simplicity in the art of flotation. This Confirmation Bill would enable the company to charge the ratepayers of Dungannon a price sufficiently high in order to pay 10 per cent. on their inflated capital. The present price of gas was so prohibitory that out of 1,040 householders in Dungannon only 245 made use of it, and that on such a small scale that the gas supply of the town was only sufficient to make darkness visible. The policy of the House had been to give the control of public utilities to the local authority. If this Bill be confirmed it would inflict a great injustice on the people of Dungannon; their streets would be broken up, their representatives would be precluded from supplying gas at a popular price, and allocating the profits to the reduction of Urban rates, and the gas company would make themselves both inconvenient and intolerable with the ultimate purpose of enormously enhancing the value of their undertaking and compelling the town to buy them out on their own terms. Hitherto the company had been mere trespassers on the streets, but this Bill would give them power of using the streets to put down mains and supply pipes, and to interfere with the sewers, the water supply, and the general efficient management of the streets. In fact, if the Town Council of Dungannon were to put a steam-roller on their own streets they would be liable for an action for damages if a leak were to occur in the company's pipes. He would give an illustration of how the company had used their powers as private monopolists. He was told on undoubted authority that about 1879 a gentleman bought a hundred £5 shares for £3 each. In 1880 these £5 shares were raised to £10, so that his capital of £300 was raised to £1,000, on which a dividend of £100 was paid; and if the Bill were passed that dividend would be raised in future to £150. Talk of Klondike. Why, it was not in it with this private company's gold mine in Dungannon. It was high time that the company should be checked in their career, instead of being confirmed by the House in their monopoly, which would enable them to break up the streets of Dungannon in despite of the unanimous opposition of the citizens and the local sanitary authority, in order to force upon them gas at a price so high that more than three-fourths of the householders at the present time refuse to use it. The local authority, in whose hands the lighting of the town should be placed, had no objection to buy the undertaking of the Gas Company at a fair price based on their true capital. But if the company obtained statutory powers they would be able, by making themselves unpalatable to the people, to force a sale on the basis of their nominal capital and at an exorbitant price. Having regard to all the circumstances in connection with this Bill, he appealed respectfully to the House to reject it, and he begged to move the motion standing in his name.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): It will be unnecessary for me to occupy the time of the House at any length in seconding the motion of the hon. Member. The hon. Member for East Tyrone alluded to that portion of the country in which Dungannon is situated, and naturally it falls to my hon. friend to make the motion concerning it. I am asked by the Urban Council of Dungannon to identify myself with his opposition, and I am requested by the chairman of the urban council, who is also agent for Lord Ranfurly, Governor of New Zealand, and by the people of the neighbourhood to take a prominent part in laying before the House the opposition to this Bill. I do not wish to say a single word against the Board of Trade. The President of the Board of Trade has always shown himself most anxious and most earnest in developing the resources of the country. While not finding fault with the manner in which the Commissioner who was sent down in March conducted the inquiry, or with the report that he made, and while I do not wish in any way to reflect upon the general management of the Board of Trade, or the manner in which its representatives act on occasions of this sort, I wish to state that a remonstrance has been sent to the Board of Trade on the part of those who object to this Provisional Order. I regret that due effect was not given to that remonstrance, for if that had been done it would have prevented the expense that will be incurred by the urban council of Dungannon in opposing this Bill in Parliament. It is unnecessary that I should at any length follow the hon. Member in the statement he has made concerning the high price of gas under the management of the gas company, and the large dividend which is paid to the shareholders. I merely wish to say that the urban ratepayers are unanimous in asking the House to reject this Bill. If this Bill is passed the householders of Dungannon will suffer a great injustice, and the only remedy that will be left will be the adoption of the electric light. I ask the House to carefully consider that this is one of those opportunities given to local bodies of developing the resources of Ireland. If the House refuses to reject this Bill on this occasion it will be striking a blow at the local government of Ireland and stultifying a measure which caused them much effort and was successfully passed through the House last session.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.' "—(Mr. Doogan.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Mr. William Johnston.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid): I wish to say two or three words on this subject. I have, like the hon. Member for South Belfast, been requested by the people of Dungannon to move in this matter and to oppose the Second Reading of the Bill. I do so as a Member from the County Tyrone and in compliance with the wishes of a great many of the inhabitants. It is quite true that the price of gas in Dungannon has been abnormal. In the county the price of gas is 1s. 3d. per 1,000 feet less than in the town of Dungannon. In the neighbouring towns it is still less. The methods by which the gas company has carried on business are certainly not such as to commend it to public favour. After what has occurred, I think we must ask the House to reject the Bill. We are now dealing with a little town in Ireland, and I ask the House to do for that town what it has done for great towns.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): Compared with the other lighting questions before the House to-day and yesterday, this is no doubt a very small matter, but it is rather an important matter for the town of Dungannon, part of which is in my constituency, and that is the reason why I speak on the subject. The first thing the House has to bear in mind is that, until the Local Government Act of 1898, the town commissioners of Dungannon were debarred from either acquiring or erecting gasworks. They had no power. They were absolutely precluded, and therefore this company is in existence and has grown up. This company, which has been in existence a great many years, has had a rather curious history. It has an entire paid up capital amounting to £4,200. Under the Order it is proposed to make this capital into a sum of £9,000. What has taken place is this. They have supplied gas to the town of Dungannon, and for the last thirty years the price of gas has varied from 7s. 6d. to 5s. 10d. per 1,000 cubic feet. They have paid dividends consistently of 10 per cent., and the profits, after payment of 10 per cent., have been used in extending the works. This inflated capital has been made through the consumers of gas in Dungannon being compelled by a monopoly to pay an exorbitant price.

That is the second thing the House ought to bear in mind. I wish to call the attention of my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade to this matter. The gentleman who held the inquiry was asked to go and inspect the works—this is really an important matter for the Board of Trade—and he declined to go. He stated that he had seen them from the railway as he passed. I rather think that on the question of inflated capital that is a fact which should be taken into account. The gentleman who inquired really did not inspect the works at all. Now the price of gas is 5s. 10d. per 1,000 feet. For fifteen or sixteen years it has been enormously in excess of the price charged by other companies in towns in the immediate neighbourhood. I think these are facts the House ought to take into account in dealing with the question, but when all is said and done this company is in possession. It has property which cannot be disposed of unless it is disposed of fairly and honestly. I have been appealed to by both parties. The chairman of the gas company is an old friend of my own—he formerly represented in this House the county a division of which I now represent—Mr. Thomas Dickson. Mr. Dickson, as representing the gas company, has given what I think is a perfectly fair proposal. This is a matter for purchase at a fair price. The town commissioners, now that they are entitled by law to purchase, have proposed to give the gas company £7,000 for the undertaking. Mr. Dickson has asked £9,000. He has, I think with perfect fairness, stated that the gas company is quite willing that £9,000 should be the maximum, and that the difference between £7,000 and £9,000 should be settled by the Government arbitrator. I recognise that as being a very fair offer. I have received a telegram stating that the Urban Council have agreed in principle to the purchase, and that the question now is one of price. I am going to make an appeal to my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade. I have been engaged for two days in opposing him, and I do not know that he will be in any very good humour for listening to any appeal I may make, but I am sure he will recognise the fairness of what I am going to ask. The question is merely one of terms, and the gas company have made an offer which cannot very well be resisted in principle by the Commissioners. What I ask is this: Do not pass this Bill to-day. By doing so you will give the gas company a statutory position which we ought not to confer while negotiations are going on. Will my right hon. friend agree to postpone this Bill for a fortnight? It has been through the House of Lords, so that it is perfectly safe. This can then be taken before an Unopposed Bill Committee, and all will end well. The local authority will get the gas company's undertaking, and the gas company will get a fair price for their undertaking. I hope my right hon. friend will make this concession, and although I have been opposing him yesterday and to-day, I trust he will heap coals of fire on my head by agreeing to my proposal.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): I can assure my hon. friend that I do not at all object to his opposition; I rather like it than otherwise. Of course, it must not be supposed that a Bill for confirming a Provisional Order is in any sense a matter promoted by the Government. It is merely an opportunity for the House to decide on the matter. My hon. friend asks for a postponement for a fortnight. Having regard to the circumstances and the facts he had brought before us, I do not think the House should resist that appeal.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): It occurs to me that this is really not quite a satisfactory way of settling this matter. In fact, I question whether it is in order. We have had a debate on the matter, and surely we do not want on a future occasion to have that debate all over again. Now, with the facts fresh in our minds, the question might be decided. Dungannon has been very badly treated by this company; there is no law for its protection at all, there is no sliding scale; and I think the House is well advised as to what should be done under the circumstances. Having heard the facts and listened to the debate, I think we ought to decide this simple question, and if my hon. friend goes to a division I shall certainly support him.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): In order to bring the matter to a point, I will move that the debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I am sorry this motion has been moved before I had an opportunity of speaking with reference to the proposal made by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, but I will endeavour to keep what I desired to say in order on the motion for adjournment. I have no objection to the proposal of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, although I do not think any legitimate ground was shown for keeping this Bill hanging in terrorem over the town commissioners of Dungannon. Still, I shall not oppose his suggestion, as it would not be a prudent thing to do under the circumstances. The hon. Member tells us that the gas company and the commissioners have come to an agreement in principle, but there is a great difference between coming to an agreement in principle and coming to an agreement as to figures. As I understand, the town commissioners are willing to pay £7,000, or nearly double the amount of capital ever subscribed to the undertaking. The chairman of the gas company wants £9,000, and in order to put pressure on the town commissioners of Dungannon to increase their offer it is proposed to keep this Bill hanging in terrorem over the commissioners, instead of doing as the House should do—reject the Bill. The hon. Member, having made a powerful attack on the gas company, suggests an adjournment in order to allow the gas company and the town commissioners to come to terms. I recognise that, without having specific instructions from the town commissioners of Dungannon, it would be taking a very serious responsibility to divide in face of that offer, and with the Bill accepted by the President of the Board of Trade. I am not prepared to take the responsibility, but I am entitled to demand, on behalf of the citizens of Dungannon, that if this compromise is agreed to the Government or the President of the Board of Trade shall give us a pledge that the Bill will be finally dealt with not later than this day fortnight. That is a matter of very great importance, as having once been withdrawn from the power of the House it may be pushed off until the end of the session, when the Irish Members may have dispersed, and then be passed. That would be a monstrous injustice, and we ought to have a definite understanding that the Bill should be placed on the Paper not later than this day fortnight.

MR. RITCHIE: I think the House would not be justified in keeping this Bill hanging indefinitely in its present condition, and I am clearly of opinion that the House ought to decide upon the issue not later than this day fortnight.

MR. DOOGAN: I might point out that the £9,000 asked by the gas company for their undertaking is exclusive of £1,739 balance of revenue, and also of the amount of coal in stock. These items if included would bring the price demanded up to between £11,000 and £12,000. I mention this as it may cause a disagreement in the arbitration. On behalf of the Urban Council, I accede to the adjournment.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON: Having seconded the motion of the hon. Member, I rise to thank the right hon. Gentleman for his very considerate reply, and to say I have no objection to the adjournment.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is the understanding that this question should be taken about the same date as the Irish Estimates?

MR. RITCHIE: That, of course depends on when the Irish Estimates are taken.

MR. FIELD: That is what we want to know, as then the Irish Members will be here.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate to be resumed upon Tuesday, 17th July.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT NEWS.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Has the right hon. Gentleman the representative of the Foreign Office any information to give the House regarding China?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The news received from various sources makes it clear that a large number of foreigners and missionaries of various denominations had taken refuge in the British Legation, which is besieged, and that the postion in Peking is very grave—but we have no direct intelligence from Peking itself. A telegram has reached us from the Consul at Tientsin, dated 28th June, stating that the three arsenals known as the Eastern Arsenal, the Haikuan Ssu, and the Si-ku or Wu-ku Arsenal have been burned by the allied forces, with immense stores of powder and ammunition.

COMMAND OF THE ALLIED FORCES.

SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): On behalf of the hon. Member for the Ecclesall Division of Sheffield, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether General Sir A. Gaselee is now on the way from India to China with the Indian contingent; and whether General Gaselee will command the allied forces on land in China.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): My answer to the first question is in the affirmative. In regard to the second, I cannot yet say what arrangements will be made as to the command and distribution of the allied forces.

SUGGESTED MOVEMENT OF TROOPS FROM SOUTH AFRICA TO CHINA.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will say on what ground Lord Roberts has declined the application made to him by the Government to detach a portion of the army now serving in South Africa for China, having regard to the fact that upwards of 250,000 men are at present under the command of Lord Roberts in a country where it has been authoritatively stated that the war is practically at an end.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Secretary of State for War is not at present prepared to give any information as to the subject of the hon. Member's question.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: When will he be in a state of preparation?

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—SIR GEORGE WHITE'S LADYSMITH DESPATCHES.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the time has now come when Sir George White's Ladysmith despatches can be published.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have repeatedly explained to the House that the publication of despatches rests entirely with the Secretary of State for War, and that I am not prepared to prejudice the exercise of his discretion by way of question and answer.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): Are we to understand from the hon. Gentleman's answer that the House of Commons is refused this information?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I do not think that question arises out of my answer. The selection of the time of publication must rest with the Secretary of State.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: I will call attention to this on the Army Estimates.

THE LATE GENERAL WAUCHOPE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that Landrost Baumann, of Hoopstad, has in his keeping the rifle, revolver, and other arms the late General Wauchope had with him when he fell at Magersfontein, and also some small trinkets belonging to the general, and has authorised Mr. Michael Davitt to state that he would hold these articles in safe keeping till some opportunity presents itself of forwarding them to the family of General Wauchope; and whether the Government, having regard to the offer of Mr. Baumann, will take any steps to provide for the immediate forwarding of these relics of General Wauchope to his relatives.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I understand that no official information has been received here referring to the hon. Member's question; but Lord Roberts has been requested by telegraph to make inquiries, and, if possible, to send home the articles mentioned.

ENTERIC FEVER—STATISTICS.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can state the number of cases of enteric fever admitted into hospitals at Bloemfontein during each of the eight weeks ending 12th May, and the number of men dying in those hospitals from this disease during the same period; and whether he can state the number of cases of simple continued fever admitted into hospitals in Natal, hospitals in Cape Colony, and hospitals north of the Orange River, respectively, with the number of deaths which occurred among these patients, whether subsequently transferred to the heading of enteric fever or not.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member has given very short notice of a question involving so much statistical research, but I will do my best to satisfy him with my answer. The number of admittances for enteric fever into hospitals at Bloemfontein and of deaths from the same cause in the eight weeks ended on 11th May—the week, for the purpose of these returns, ending on Friday—were:—23rd March: admitted, 88; died, 5. 30th March: admitted, 160; died, 9. 6th April: admitted, 166; died, 21. 13th April: admitted, 377; died, 34. 20th April: admitted, 263; died, 44. 27th April: admitted, 224; died, 54. 4th May: admitted, 226; died, 54. 11th May: admitted, 583; died, 65; making totals of 2,087 admissions and 286 deaths. That give a percentage of 13·7. The second question scarcely admits of an answer. I can only give the total admissions for simple continued fever, which were 5,860 and deaths only one. But I think the hon. Member will see that if a case was subsequently diagnosed as enteric fever the death would be set down as from enteric fever and not as from simple continued fever.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Can the hon. Gentleman say how many of the admissions and deaths were of non-commissioned officers, and how many of men?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have the numbers of commissioned and non-commissioned officers and men in parallel columns, but it would be confusing to simply read them to the House.

ENTERIC FEVER—THE SERUM TEST.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will state what steps were taken by the War Office to provide means for the application of the serum test (Widal's method) to the diagnosis of doubtful cases of enteric fever in general hospitals in South Africa; whether he is aware that this means of making an early diagnosis is largely used by hospitals and local sanitary authorities; and whether he will take immediate steps to provide every general hospital in South Africa with the skilled assistance and simple appliances necessary in those cases in which such provision has not yet been made.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No special steps have been taken beyond the general training of medical officers in this method of diagnosis. The test is being applied in South Africa, and Army medical officers are quite capable of carrying it out.

PRIVATE SOLDIERS—MESSING AND RATION ALLOWANCES.

MR. ELLIOT (Durham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, seeing that private soldiers on active service are entitled to 6d. per diem in addition to free rations, whether he will explain why, when payment is asked for by soldiers in South Africa, they have been told that payment will not be made till the end of the war.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member has been misinformed. Soldiers on active service get free rations, including vegetables and groceries when possible, and they also get the 3d. messing allowance, but not the 6d. ration allowance. The ration allowance, however, is due to a soldier for any day on which he did not draw a ration, and the money is paid to him weekly if he desires. On a campaign, however, occasions may, of course, arise which preclude the possibility of such payment for a time.

CENSORSHIP REGULATIONS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to certain Minutes published in the Natal Witness, which have passed between the Prime Minister of Natal, the Governor, General Murray, and Sir Redvers Buller respecting the detention, opening, and suppression of letters and documents passing through the Post Office by the Censorship Department, and especially to the observation of the Prime Minister of Natal that the opening of private letters had been indiscriminate and unnecessarily rigorous and inquisitorial; whether he is aware that the Governor expressed by Minute agreement with his Ministers; whether, inasmuch as the matter has thus become public in Natal, these and any other Minutes on the subject which have passed between the Prime Minister and Governor of Natal and the generals referred to will be laid upon the Table of the House; and whether he will lay upon the Table any documents which have been issued by the Government, or those responsible in South Africa, prescribing or dealing in any way with the manner in which the censorship of telegrams or letters should be carried out in South Africa or elsewhere.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Secretary of State has no objection whatever to the publication in this country of the documents which have been published in Natal. I do not know whether the hon. Member has seen the correspondence.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Yes, I have it. Will the hon. Gentleman answer the last paragraph of my question?

*MR. WYNDHAM: That should be addressed to the Foreign Office, as the general question of censorship is a much larger one, and refers to more than one Department.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I will put a question to the First Lord of the Treasury.

TREATMENT OF DISCHARGED SOLDIERS—CASE OF PRIVATE WEIR.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I wish to ask the Under Secretary for War a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, what explanation has the War Office to give for the removal from Netley Hospital of Private Robert Weir, of the 27th Inniskilling Fusiliers, who had served with his regiment all through the Natal campaign, and was sent home in an enfeebled state of body and mind, and of the deportation of this soldier, who is without a pension and has received no gratuity, to the workhouse at Enniskillen, where he is at present a pauper inmate.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have received no notice, and it is obvious I could not have answered such a question under forty-eight hours notice.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I sent it to the War Office, and had a letter from the hon. Gentleman's private secretary.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member must give longer notice.

ARTILLERY ESTABLISHMENT—REDUCTION IN 1892-95.

*MR. M'KENNA (Monmouthshire, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether there was any reduction in the strength of artillery or diminution in the store of ammunition during the three years from July, 1892, to June, 1895.

*MR. WYNDHAM: This question does not admit of a single reply. The changes made in the artillery of the last ten or twenty years embrace changes not only in the number of units but in the number also of men and guns. The hon. Member had much better ask for a Return, which I shall be quite prepared to grant.

*MR. M'KENNA: My question is clear—whether there was any reduction in the strength of artillery or diminution of stores in a specified period.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I quite see the object of the question. We all recollect there was a diminution of stores. But I put that on one side. What does the hon. Member mean by the rest of his question; does he mean a reduction of batteries, of guns, or of men? He will get the information much more clearly if he will allow me to give it by way of Return.

*MR. M'KENNA: What was the information given to the Colonial Secretary, on which he based some recent observations?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

ARMY PENSION REGULATIONS.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY (Devonshire, Honiton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a soldier incapacitated from all employment by illness contracted while on duty in camp in England and discharged as unfit for further service is entitled to a pension as if he had been on foreign service; and, if so, to whom should application be made.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The conditions are not quite the same, but application should be made to the same authorities, namely, the Commissioners of Chelsea Hospital.

LICHFIELD RIFLE RANGE.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state what progress is being made towards the construction of the contemplated rifle range near Withington Barracks, Lichfield; and if anything has been done in the matter in the last two months.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Since the passing of the Act confirming the Provisional Order for the acquisition of the land required for this range, the notices to treat have been served on the various owners concerned, and we are now awaiting their claims, when endeavours will be made to arrange terms by negotiation, but where this is not possible recourse to arbitration will be necessary. The construction of the range cannot be commenced until possession of the land has been obtained.

VOLUNTEER MOUNTED INFANTRY GRANT.

MR. LUCAS-SHADWELL (Hastings): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what grant the Government proposes to make towards the expenses of Volunteer mounted infantry beyond the ordinary grant to Volunteers.

*MR. WYNDHAM: It has been decided to grant for this year an initial equipment allowance of £10 10s., an efficiency grant of £4, in addition to the ordinary capitation grant to provide for maintenance of equipment and hire of horses, and a special grant of 12s. for each day a Volunteer earns camp allowance, to cover the cost of providing and maintaining a horse in camp, and a travelling allowance of 3d. a mile to cover conveyance of horses to and from camp.

MR. LUCAS-SHADWELL: Does this arrangement apply to this year only, or is it permanent?

*MR. WYNDHAM: This year only. We are not prepared to deal with questions of permanent policy at this moment.

SHORNCLIFFE CAMP — HOSPITAL ARRANGEMENTS—DEATH OF SERGEANT WILMSHURST.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he is aware that at an inquest held on Saturday last at Shorncliffe Camp, on Sergeant Wilmshurst, of the Sussex Regiment, it was shown in evidence that there was not a single orderly of the Army Medical Corps in the hospital, and that Wilmshurst, when taken to the hospital in a fit, died before a doctor could be found; and in view of the comments made by the jury at the inquest, whether he can say what steps, if any, are now being taken to secure without delay an adequate staff for our military hospitals both at home and abroad.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No information has been received in the War Office of this incident, but inquiry will be made. the staff of the hospital consists of a sergeant-major, a sergeant, two corporals, and fourteen orderlies of the Army Medical Corps, besides regimental soldiers. The hon. Member will see that I have to make further inquiry in order to give an exhaustive answer to this question. I put it to him and to other Members that when a question comes before me for the first time at ten or eleven o'clock in the morning at the War Office, it is impossible to deal with it satisfactorily before the House sits. I trust that more consideration will in future be shown to an already over-burdened Department.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I will renew the question a few days hence.

ROYAL RESERVE REGIMENT OF HUSSARS.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is aware that the Royal Reserve Regiment of Hussars. now quartered at Hounslow, has been embodied for seven weeks, and had up to last week received no grooming kit and only sixteen saddles, so that the regiment is compelled to drag their horses round the barrack square with ropes and chains; and when the Department propose to make this cavalry corps efficient.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The requisitions for the saddlery and grooming kits were not received at Woolwich until the 20th June, the whole supply was despatched on or before the 28th June.

MILITIA EXAMINATIONS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, seeing that till last autumn the militia competitive examination consisted of Military law, tactics, fortification, and military topography, he will explain why the subjects of military law and tactics have been excluded from the course, and military history, consisting of the first 130 pages of Hamley's "Operations of War," dealing with the strategic movements in the Napoleonic Wars, substituted since the South African War, such being a study of a system of military operations rendered obsolete by smokeless powder and the improvements in modern firearms.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The changes were made because it was thought better to have one instead of two examinations. But care was taken not to prejudice the chances of candidates who had passed the first examination under the old system.

MAJOR RASCH: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is now in a position to state whether Militia candidates doing duty with their embodied battalions will be forced to pass a competitive examination in September; and, if so, in what subjects they will be examined.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The subjects for the revised Militia examination were published in August, 1899. As I have stated in reply to a previous question, arrangements have been made to prevent hardship to those who have already passed the first examination under the old system. These arrangements would have been in force in March if an examination had been held; and they will be in force in September. I may point out the necessity for a competition examination depends on whether or not there are more vacancies than candidates.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will there be a competitive examination in September?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I think almost certainly, but it depends whether the number of candidates exceeds the number of vacancies. If a greater number of gentlemen wish to enter the Army than there are vacancies for, then they must compete between themselves for the vacancies.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): Will the officers now serving at the front be required to go through the same literary competitive examinations as those in garrisons? If so, it will be extremely hard.

*Mr. WYNDHAM: It is difficult to deal with this matter in answer to questions. Care has been taken to make the examinations as equal as possible. It is impossible for the officers at the front to compete next September, and therefore a portion of places will be set apart and will be filled up on the nomination of Lord Roberts. As to officers of Militia at home or on the Mediterranean stations a difficulty arises, because commanding officers have been able to give leave to some, but have had to refuse it to others. We hope, however, to meet their case by granting a proportion of marks for every day of duty done, and every day on board ship, which will equalise conditions as far as possible.

MR. BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): Arising out of this answer may I ask whether in the case of Militia abroad, but not in South Africa, the examination of candidates will be held in England or at their respective stations?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The examination in these cases will be held at the respective stations for those candidates who are at their stations, and an allowance of marks will be made for every day of duty done and for every day on board ship.

BELLEVILLE BOILERS—ROYALTIES AND FEES.

MR. PENN (Lewisham): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether in new designs for, or on points of detail in, the construction of Belleville boilers the Belleville Company is consulted; and, if so, what fee is paid, and what is the total sum so paid since the adoption of the boiler, over and above anything paid as royalty, and what is the total amount paid, and to be paid, as royalty.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The reply to the first part of the hon. Member's question is in the affirmative. The fee for this consultation is included in the royalty. The only extra payment to the Belleville Company beyond the royalty is for drawings which they supply. The actual amount paid up to date for royalty is £116,192, and for drawings £644, in respect of fifty-four ships. The approximate amount remaining to be paid for royalty in respect of forty-eight ships is £49,231.

WATER-TUBE BOILERS.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, having regard to the technical character of the controversy as to the use of water-tube boilers on Her Majesty's ships, he could, for the convenience of the House, lay on the Table a Memorandum on the subject a few days before the discussion on Vote 8 of the Navy Estimates is taken.

MR. GOSCHEN: I will see what materials for the discussion on water-tube boilers I can place before the House before the Vote is taken, but my own review of the case, which I am anxious to make as little technical as the case admits, I propose to embody in the statement which I shall make to the House.

AUSTRALIA AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE —AUSTRALIAN HELP IN THE CHINESE DIFFICULTY.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty when he will be in a position to make his promised statement respecting the new arrangements to be made on the termination of the Australian agreement sanctioned by the Imperial Defence Act, 1888.

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not remember giving the undertaking to which the hon. Gentleman refers, but matters will remain as they are until the central government in Australia is formed under the Commonwealth Bill, when, of course, any negotiation would be easier. I may mention that, there being among our ships on the Australian station several suitable for work in Chinese waters, the Secretary of State telegraphed for the consent of the Australian colonies to their temporary withdrawal, which consent is necessary under the Imperial Defence Act. This consent was given in twenty-four hours, and in the most cordial manner.

*SIR J. COLOMB: May I ask if the cost of these ships sent from Australia to China is defrayed by the United Kingdom?

MR. GOSCHEN: I think the Australian colonies are far more bent on helping us in China than on any financial question.

REORGANISATION OF THE MILITARY FORCES OF THE EMPIRE.

MR. DRAGE (Derby): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any attempt has been made to ascertain the views of the Colonial and Indian Governments on the reorganisation of the military forces of the Empire; and whether the Government will consider the desirability of adding to the Committee of the Council of Defence representatives of the great self-governing colonies and of India.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that opportunity has been taken to consult the authorities on the question referred to by my hon. friend. The Committee referred to in the question is a Committee of the Cabinet, and the Government, therefore, cannot add to it in the manner suggested.

SIRDAR BHAI SHAMSHERE SINGH.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he is aware of the arrangements made for the education, during his minority, of Sirdar Bhai Shamshere Singh, the present chief of Arnowli and head of the Bhaikean family in the Punjab; and whether he will ascertain if there is any reason why the Sirdar should not be allowed a tutor competent to educate him in English, and in a manner becoming the position he is likely to hold on his coming of age.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): This chief is at present only nine years old, and his brother six years old. The estate to which he is heir has only a moderate income, and is in debt. The arrangements for the education of these boys are made by the Court of Wards, subject to the approval of the Punjab Government, and under these circumstances there is much to be said in favour of a good native tutor until the lads are old enough to go to the Sirdar's college.

CANADIAN ARTILLERY—CASE OF CORPORAL COURTNEY.

MR. WOODS (Essex, Walthamstow): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that Corporal Courtney, of A Battery, Kingston, Toronto, was on the 24th May ordered to march a squad of the battery to the canteen to drink the Queen's health in beer, to which he had a personal objection; and that, in consequence, he has been reduced to the ranks; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the case.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I have no information as to the incident to which the hon. Member refers. The administration of the Canadian Militia is entirely a matter for the Canadian Government, and Her Majesty's Government have no right or desire to interfere in a question which solely concerns one of the self-governing colonies.

BANKRUPTCY TRUSTEES AND ASSIGNMENTS OF DEBTS.

SIR HENRY STANLEY (Lambeth N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that trustees in bankruptcy receive notices of assignments of debts due to creditors; whether it is the duty of trustees to assure themselves that assignments do in fact exist before parting with moneys in their hands; and whether he will take steps, by legislation or otherwise, to provide that trustees receiving notices of assignment should at once apprise the creditors concerned.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): The answer to the first two paragraphs of the question is in the affirmative. With reference to the third paragraph, I am of opinion that there is no necessity for legislation.

SALE OF UNDERSIZED SEA-FISH—LEGISLATION IN FOREIGN COUNTRIES.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing what legislation, if any, has been adopted by and now exists in France, Belgium, Holland, Prussia, and Denmark, respectively, with regard to the limits of size of sea-fish allowed to be caught, imported or exported, possessed or sold, as well as the penalties, if any, imposed by such legislation, the conditions under which such penalties are incurred, and the date of each law included in the Return.

SIR CAMERON GULL (Devonshire, Barnstaple): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, may I ask if he will include in any such Return a statement whether the legislation referred to is strictly enforced in those countries.

MR. RITCHIE: One can hardly ask a foreign Government if the laws enacted in its country are strictly enforced. I am making inquiries through the Foreign Office, and will consider when I receive the replies how far I can supply the information desired by my hon. friend.

*SIR J. COLOMB: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire if there are any prosecutions in those countries?

MR. RITCHIE: I think that is rather beyond the scope of our inquiries.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake to give us the information before proceeding with the Undersized Fish Bill?

MR. RITCHIE: I cannot undertake anything of the kind. Whatever may be the regulations in force in other countries, they have nothing to do with the passing of this Bill.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: But that is one of the questions the House is asked to deal with.

RAILWAY PASSENGERS' LUGGAGE.

SIR CAMERON GULL: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he will grant a Return of the amounts of free luggage which the various railway companies are under statutory liability to allow to the several classes of passengers over the different portions of their lines.

MR. RITCHIE: The Board of Trade are in communication with the Railway Association, and have said they assume that the companies will have no difficulty in supplying the information. I shall press for an early reply.

FRIENDLY SOCIETIES AND DEATH CERTIFICATES.

MR. WOODS: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General will he explain on what authority the registrars charge varying sums of from 1s. to 2s. 7d. for certificates of death of members of registered trade unions, who have funeral benefits attached to their societies, seeing that registered friendly societies only pay 1s. for such certificates, which is fixed by law, and whether he can take any action with a view of making the same charge for obtaining certificates for registered trade unions.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the question. Section 97 of the Friendly Societies Act, 1896, provides that for the purposes of that Act a certificate of the death of any member of a registered friendly society is to be given by the Registrar of Deaths for a sum not exceeding 1s. This enactment, however, does not apply in the case of the death of a member of a registered trade union, and consequently in such a case the ordinary fee of 2s. 7d. is payable for a certificate of death. I have no power to take the action suggested in the last paragraph of the question.

CIVIL SERVICE RETIREMENT REGULATIONS.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether, in view of the fact that the notice issued by the Civil Service Commissioners, on 7th April, 1894, announcing a competition limited to registered copyists for eight appointments as abstractor or assistant clerk, stating the maximum limit of age for entry at sixty, it was contemplated to retire a successful competitor upon reaching that age.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): Whatever may or may not have been in the mind of the authorities when that notice was issued, there can be no question that, under the general rule of the service laid down in Clause 10 of the Order in Council of 15th August, 1890, and Clause 18 of the Order of 29th November, 1898, a civil servant is liable to be called upon to retire at the age of sixty.

ACCOUNTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE. DUBLIN.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the late Mr. T. J. O'Brien, of the Consolidated Accounting Office of the Supreme Court of Judicature in Ireland, was allowed a special salary amounting to £210 per annum for the discharge of the duties of Clerk in Charge of the Vote Account, and that, since shortly after Mr. O'Brien's decease in June, 1898, these duties have been performed by a junior clerk at a salary of £140, who recently presented a petition to the Lord Chancellor praying for an allowance similar to Mr. O'Brien's; whether the Lord Chancellor on receipt of the petition instructed the Accountant General to take steps to have these duties performed by a first class clerk; and, whether, seeing that the time of the three first class clerks is fully engaged by other responsible duties, and that it has been found impossible to get the work of the Vote Account done by the present first class staff, an additional first class clerk will be appointed; and, if not, whether an adequate allowance will be given to the junior clerk who has during the past two years been discharging the duties connected with the Vote Account.

MR. HANBURY: The junior clerk referred to (who is only nominally clerk in charge and receives all necessary directions from his superior officer) has the same salary as Mr. O'Brien's predecessor. Mr. O'Brien was allowed the exceptional fixed salary of £210 to compensate him for the fact that being outside the normal organisation of the Office, he had no right of promotion such as Mr. Wilson has, and was on a much lower scale of pay. Mr. Wilson's salary after thirteen years service will be £230, rising by £10 to £300 as against £210, fixed salary paid to Mr. O'Brien after the same period of service—and this irrespective of his chance of promotion.

IRISH LAND ACTS—THE ASHBOURNE ACT.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that purchasers under the Ashbourne Act are only entitled to about £10 per cent. every ten years, while purchasers under the Land Bill of 1896 will be entitled to £14 after ten years; whether he is also aware that the sinking fund under the Ashbourne Act is only 17s. 6d., while under the Bill of 1896 it is £1 5s.; and whether there is any reason for not placing the purchasers under the Ashbourne Acts on as favourable terms as the purchasers under the Bill of 1896.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The first paragraph of the question appears to be based upon a misapprehension, for though the Treasury rules and tables have been published so far as regards the application of the decade system to purchases under the Ashbourne Act, they have not yet been issued with regard to purchases under the Acts of 1891 and 1896. There is no authority, therefore, for assuming that the sum of £14 per cent. is correct. The facts are as stated in the second paragraph. The advances under the Ashbourne Act were made by means of the realisation of stock issued under the Local Loans Act at 3 per cent., advances under the Acts of 1891 and 1896 by the issue of guaranteed land stock bearing dividends at £2 15s. per cent., which is provided by the interest portion of the tenant purchasers' annuities, the balance of the annuity, £1 5s., being accumulated against the annuity. The Local Loans stock is not redeemable until 1912.

LISTOWEL SUB-COMMISSION.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can give the number of originating notices served by tenants to have judicial rents fixed before the Sub-Land Commission at Listowel; whether he is aware that dissatisfaction exists in North Kerry owing to the delays caused to tenants by the fact of their applications to have fair rents fixed being delayed for such long periods; and whether he can say when the next sitting of the Sub-Land Commission at Listowel will be held.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There are 115 cases from the union of Listowel, in which the applications to fix fair rents have not as yet been listed for hearing before a Sub-Commission. Apart from the statement in the question, I am not aware that dissatisfaction of the nature indicated exists in the district referred to. Sittings of Sub-Commissions have been held for the disposal of cases from that district as frequently as has been found possible, having regard to the claims of other districts. It is probable that a list containing the majority of the 115 cases now outstanding will be issued towards the close of the present year, but no definite arrangements have as yet been made.

MR. FLAVIN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the real cause of the dissatisfaction is that the orginating notices were served so long ago as three years last March?

[No answer was given.]

IRISH LUNATIC ASYLUM REGULATIONS.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to a resolution adopted by the Board of the Limerick District Asylum pointing out the state of the law as regards the admission of lunatics in Ireland; and, seeing that after the magistrates, in conjunction with the medical officer called to examine insane patients, make the order for committal to an asylum, there is no power to compel the friends or relations of such patients to pay for their maintenance, even if they are able to afford it, whether power could be given to the authorities of asylums in Ireland to compel payment for patients so committed on ascertaining that the persons responsible for their support are in a position to do so.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: No such resolution, I am informed, has been passed by the Board of the Limerick District Asylum. I may observe, however, that the power to compel friends or relatives of patients committed as dangerous lunatics, under the tenth section of the Act 30 and 31 Vict. c. 118, to pay for their maintenance could only be given by legislation.

THE SEIZURE OF THE "UNITED IRISHMAN."

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that certain issues of the United Irishman, published at Ormond Quay, Dublin, were seized and confiscated by the Dublin metropolitan police and also by the constabulary; whether he can explain to the House the reasons for such seizure and confiscation; and whether he would state upon whose orders those seizures were made.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This question only appeared on the Paper this morning, and as all the official documents on the subject are in Dublin, I will ask the hon. Member to defer the question until Thursday.

DUBLIN CONSTABULARY CLOTHING.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, having regard to the fact that the uniform and clothing of the Dublin police are imported from England, although this force is largely supported out of local rates, and that the uniforms of the Royal Irish Constabulary, and the uniform and clothing used in the Irish Prison Service, and the Army clothing used in Ireland, are obtained also in England, and in view of the difficulty entailed on Irish manufacturers by the system of contracts established by the Government Department at Pimlico, whether the Government would consider the advisability of starting an Irish Government Clothing Department, so that local manufactures may be established on lines which would make it possible for the clothing used in Irish Government Services to be made in Ireland.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The contractors for the supply of cloth for the Irish police are all, I believe, resident in England, but the making up of the articles of clothing is, with the exception of helmets, in the hands of Irish firms. The subject of contracts for the clothing of the police has on more than one occasion engaged my own personal consideration. Proposals have been made to me that these contracts should be restricted to Irish firms alone, and that the existing system of inspection at the Army Clothing Department in London should be abolished. As regards the first proposal, every facility has been given to Irish firms to tender, and they have been supplied with samples of the standard patterns. It is impracticable for the Government to consent to the restriction of these contracts to Irish firms alone, but in the case of such firms the only requirement necessary to secure the adoption of an Irish made cloth as a sealed pattern is that it should stand the War Office tests. The suggestion that an inspection depôt should be established in Ireland has been brought before the War Department, but they were unable to concur in it.

MR. T. M. HEALY: As you have established an Agricultural Department to enable Irish landlords to improve their position, why not have an Industrial Department to give the people a chance of earning wages? As the Dublin people pay £30,000 or £40,000 a year, they ought at least to have a chance of having the clothing made in Dublin.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Are we to understand that the Royal Irish Constabulary are a branch of the War Office and under its control?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The clothing contracts are.

POTATO GROWING IN IRELAND—EXPERIMENTS WITH ELECTRICITY.

MR. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Board of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland if his attention has been directed to a series of experiments made by Mr. O'Sullivan, of Athea, in the county of Limerick, with a view of improving potato growing; whether he is aware that under this new system an increase of 80 per cent. in the crop is shown; and will the Department cause inquiries to be made into the matter.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKETT, Dublin County, S.): My attention has been called to the experiments referred to in the question. I understand that Mr. O'Sullivan attributes the extraordinary increase in his potato crop to the action of electricity introduced through lightning conductors and distributed through the crop by means of wires. As both the parish priest of Athea and the county surveyor of Limerick are satisfied both as to the effect and the cause of this remarkable phenomenon, I shall have inquiries made on behalf of the Department.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): Can the right hon. Gentleman say what the cost per acre of electricity is?

MR. PLUNKETT: The Department has not made its inquiries yet.

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY.

MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Governors of Queen Anne's Bounty have assented to the proposed inquiry into the constitution of the Board; and whether the inquiry will be enlarged so as to include the powers as well as the constitution of the Board.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have done my best to acquaint myself with the wishes of the Governors, and I do not think the reference need be altered.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can tell us what will be the business to-morrow and on Thursday. And

I would venture to remind him of the Indian Budget. Public attention has been directed to Indian questions generally, and I think he seemed disposed a few days ago to give some consideration to it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The work immediately before us is the Tithes Bill of my right hon. friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and the Agricultural Holdings Bill, the consideration of which was commenced last night. As regards the Indian Budget, my right hon. friend is perfectly correct in saying that I am anxious to advance the ordinary date upon which the Indian Budget is taken. That, as the House is aware, is just before the Third Reading of the Appropriation Bill, which, during this Parliament, has come on in the second week in August. I hope to considerably advance that date, but I am not yet in a position to say exactly what day it will be convenient for the House to allocate to that purpose.

MR. JOHN REDMOND (Waterford): What will be the business to-morrow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Tithes Bill will be put down again for to-morrow.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—POSITION OF BRITISH LEGATION AT PEKING.

[MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.]

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil) rose in his place, and asked leave to move the Adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, "the present position of the British Legation at Peking, and the necessity of taking immediate and definite steps in the matter"; but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, MR. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the motion to rise in their places, and not less than forty Members having accordingly risen:—

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I am sure the whole of the House will regret to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs that the gravest possible fear exists with regard to the safety of British residents in Peking, and especially with regard to the Legation. I am not altogether without hope that there is a probability that the Peking Legation can hold out until some relief comes, but in the meantime we are face to face with this very grave difficulty: We do not know who is the ruling power in China to-day; we do not know whether it is the Dowager Empress, or whether she has been removed; and we do not know whether it is Prince Tuan or his son. That being so, and there being such a terrible state of confusion, I think that Her Majesty's Government ought to consider the advisability of taking some step, in conjunction with other Powers, to consider the question of creating a Regency in China. With Peking, at the present moment, it is impossible to hold any communication, and even if it were possible, matters are in such a disturbed condition that it would be impracticable to arrive at any solution of this very grave difficulty. I would like the House to follow me in one or two observations with regard to these disturbances. They exist only in one part of China—that is in the extreme north in the provinces of Shantung and Chihli. There are various causes given for these disturbances, and causes which perhaps it would not be well to remind the House or the country of at the present moment. But the Chinese have had some causes of complaint, not least among them being the demands of the various foreign Powers for concessions of railways throughout their Empire, and not only for concessions for railways, but insisting upon the Chinese Government undertaking to pay interest on the capital which was required for the building of these railways. That was one of the causes, perhaps, which led to these disturbances. I am not defending the Chinese in any way, but do not let the House misunderstand me. I want the House to understand that the disturbances have arisen in those particular districts where these concessions have been insisted upon from the Chinese. It is impossible, probably, to change the form of Government or the Constitution of China. The status quo should, perhaps, in the opinion of those best able to judge, be maintained. But, in the meantime, we have this danger—a danger to the lives of British subjects at Peking, and also a danger to the lives of all foreigners, which, of course, their respective Governments will probably also consider. I do not think it is generally known to the House or to the country that there is a provisional Government already appointed in China. That provisional Government consists of Li Hung Chang (who is at the head of it), Chang Tsi Tung, Lien Quan Yih, Yuen Chih Kai, and Yu Lien Chan. I think Her Majesty's Government is aware officially of the existence of this provisional Government, and these Gentlemen are Viceroys of the most important provinces in China. But these provinces are situated at great distances from each other, and it is utterly and absolutely impossible for them to enter into communication with each other daily or hourly, as the importance of the subject would necessitate. I would suggest—and I am not doing this for the purpose of embarrassing Her Majesty's Government—that a Regent should be appointed. I suggest that you should have one man with whom you can deal in China, and the experience of all those who know Chinese affairs points unmistakably to one man as the strongest man in China, who is head and shoulders above everybody else, and who some thirty years ago was considered the most eligible man to occupy the throne of China. He is the man whom General Gordon picked out for the throne, and Gordon would have put him upon that throne if one of the Powers had not found out what Gordon was going to do, and the result was that Gordon was recalled upon the particular day he was going to do it. That man is Li Hung Chang. He is the most prominent statesman in China. He has more influence there to-day, for his mere name strikes terror into the heart of every Chinaman, and I say that in this extreme emergency, having regard to the fact that you do not know who is on the throne to-day, that Her Majesty's Ministers do not know to-day who is the Emperor or who is the Empress of China, it is the duty of the Government to consider the question of creating a Regency and communicating with other Powers to find someone in China who can be dealt with at this critical moment, and who may even now save the lives of British subjects and others in Peking. From the year 1860 up to the Japanese war Li Hung Chang was looked upon as the heir apparent to the throne. I hope that the Government will not for a moment consider that I am making this suggestion in order to embarrass them, for I am only doing it in order that it may be made known to the other Powers that there is a possibility of saving the lives of the foreigners who are in Peking, and I do not hesitate to say that Li Hung Chang would do it. It is not only my opinion, but also the opinion of the highest Chinese authorities, that Li Hung Chang is the man who can probably put an end to these disturbances, and I would beg and pray of Her Majesty's Government and the other Powers in Europe and America to consider the question of creating this Regency at this critical moment, and later on consider the question of whom you are going to put on the throne. It is necessary that changes should be made in order that peace and prosperity may attend that mighty Empire. I appeal to the House, having regard to our being in ignorance as to whether there is at present any head of the Government, to consider whether one should not be created. I believe that if Li Hung Chang were to go north there would be a rising of the Cantonese and Southern Chinese against the Manchu dynasty. Leave him where he is for the present; terms can be made, and then Li Hung Chang can proceed to Peking, accompanied by troops if necessary. I am certain that this is the only possible means of restoring order. I beg to move that this House do now adjourn.

*Mr. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to second the motion as a matter of form, because, though there has not been a stronger critic in this House of the policy pursued by Her Majesty Government in relation to affairs in China than I have been, yet I am bound to say that I believe in the present crisis they have done all in their power to protect the lives and property of British subjects in China. I have the honour of personally knowing Admiral Seymour, and I feel certain that all that courage, determination, and ability could do was done by him and the 2,000 troops under him when they attempted to reach Peking to relieve the foreigners there. My opinion is that long before any such an arrangement as that foreshadowed by the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken could possibly be given effect to there would be no foreigners in Peking to be relieved. From all I gathered during my visit to the districts where the rebellion now is, a few months ago, and from my somewhat extensive journeys throughout China, I believe it is a fact that the great bulk of the inhabitants throughout that country have no sympathy with the present rising. I believe that the great hope of staying the rising and preserving the integrity of the country lies in intimating distinctly—in concert with Japan, the United States, Germany, and any other Power interested in China that would join in the intimation—to the great Viceroys of Nankin and Wuchang that they can rely on no attempt being made by any of the Powers to seize territory in that great heart of China—the Yang-tsze region—and that the Powers will co-operate with the Viceroys in the interests of order. With regard to the suggestion of the hon. Gentleman that Li Hung Chang should be made Regent of the great Chinese Empire, my own feeling is that it would be much wiser on the part of Her Majesty's Government to intimate to Li Hung Chang that they would hold him responsible in purse and person for any outrages committed on foreigners in the districts under his governorship. I hope the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs will be able to give us some information that will show that the opinion I have expressed that Her Majesty's Government are doing all that is humanly possible to relieve Peking is true. I certainly do not think that this is an opportune moment to raise any further question than that which has been declared to be of urgent and definite public importance—namely, what has been done and is being done to reach Peking with an expeditionary force in time to save the lives of the foreigners there. I must say, knowing as I do personally many of those now cooped up in Peking surrounded by those hordes of Chinese, that one's heart goes out to them and is sad when one thinks that even at the present moment, while we are discussing this question here, it is seriously possible that there may be none of them alive for relief to be taken to.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Pritchard Morgan.)

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): It is a matter of concern, in view of the most serious, sudden, and unexpected events that have occurred, that notice should be taken of them in this House, even by way of moving the adjournment—always an unsatisfactory method. The events which have occurred are undoubtedly not only of a most unexpected character, but are of the greatest possible importance and fraught with the greatest issues—issues which concern not only the relations of the Powers to China but the relation of the Powers towards each other, which is, perhaps, the gravest and most serious difficulty that may arise out of this rising in China. But we must also not forget that on these events and the turn they may take will depend also the future of so large a portion of the earth's population as one-third. I agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite that this is not a popular rising in China in the sense of being a rising of the whole people. It is a small provoked rising, but none the less serious for that. I believe Her Majesty's Government are once more at the parting of the ways, as they were when they were called upon to remove Her Majesty's ships from Port Arthur. There are two courses to be initiated at the Foreign Office, and upon the wise choice between these courses will depend, I believe, the future of China and the whole future of British prospects in the East. I think there can be no doubt that the Imperial Government at Peking as we knew it a fortnight ago has disappeared. It no longer exists, and in its place there is chaos, accompanied, as the hon. Member opposite said, with the most awful danger to Europeans in Peking. I am convinced I am not exaggerating the situation when I say that chaos reigns in the Chinese capital, and that there is no form of Government to appeal to. The only question that I think we ought to consider now is, the Chinese Government we have known having disappeared, what is to be done to carry on our relations with China, to secure law and order and the observance of treaties. I cannot for a moment agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite that England ought, in company with other Powers, to intervene with the Government of China by nominating a Viceroy, I care not whether he be Li Hung Chang or anyone else. Not only have we no right to impose a Viceroy on China, but I will undertake to say that we have no power to do it. I therefore entirely repudiate the suggestion made to that effect, but I repudiate still more strongly the suggestion that Li Hung Chang should be held personally responsible for events over which he has no control and which he could not have prevented.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON: My remarks referred only to the districts under the control of Li Hung Chang.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: No such occurrences have taken place in those districts, nor are any expected, and I am sorry, therefore, that the hon. Gentleman should have made such a strong suggestion on a mere possible contingency which I believe will not arise. I need not recall to the House that China consists of eighteen provinces governed by nine Viceroys and nine Governors, who have always been the real Governors of China. The Imperial Government of China is a shadowy something not after our idea of government. There is no central Government for taxation, and the government of the country is carried on by the Viceroys. I have information which I believe to be absolutely true, and which comes from a very serious and well-informed source, to the effect that of the nine Viceroys six have already met together and have practically formed a provisional Government. These Viceroys are the Governors of the central and southern provinces.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: They have never met together yet.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I do not know how late the hon. Gentlemen's information may be—whether it is information he brought from China or information he received since his return, but my information is that there has been common action between the six Viceroys I have indicated. It is possible they may not have all met, but by inter-communication they have achieved this result. They have practically formed a provisional Government, which at this moment exists, and they are prepared and are in a position to guarantee good order and the safety of foreigners in their own provinces, and are also prepared to guarantee the execution of treaties with foreign Powers.

They are, in other words, a de facto Government, with powers much more real than were ever exercised by the Imperial Court, and they are ready to undertake the government of the country. That is a more natural arrangement than one Viceroy or one Regent, and they look for —and for my part I trust they will obtain —the support of Her Majesty's Government. We have lost one Government, but we have got another. I am not sure whether it will last, but there it is for the moment, and it is for the moment that we want some controlling power able to take charge of an abandoned Empire. Assuming that my information is correct—and I am pretty certain that it is—this Government does exist. It is not a Government de jure but it is a Government de facto. It has been the tradition of England to recognise de facto Governments, and I hope this tradition will be carried out in connection with China. That tradition always seems to me practical and useful, and should be pursued by Her Majesty's Government. We do not know what awful vistas of war, confusion, and trouble may be opened up in these Eastern parts. We do not know on what conditions the Powers are going to intervene. Are they to elect a Regent, or any other new form of Government? I am most profoundly convinced that if Her Majesty's Government attempt to invent a form of government for the Chinese and impose it upon them, they will undoubtedly meet with a most ignominious failure. Twenty-one times has China been invaded, and twenty-one times has China absorbed the invader, and the invader has become a Chinaman. Do not let us make the attempt. [Laughter.] I am sorry that on this grave emergency hon. Members should laugh. Do not let us attempt, in our position, to invent and to impose any new form of Government on the Chinese. Her Majesty's Government should at once recognise the de facto Government and give them such support as to carry with them, at any rate, the central and southern provinces over which the Viceroys hold sway, in the terrible emergency with which they are confronted.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I only desire to ask one question of the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs on the subject before the House. Is it the fact, or is there any foundation for the statement, that the American Admiral in Chinese waters objected to the policy of the other Powers in attacking the Ta-ku forts, and pointed out that an attack on those forts was calculated to force the regular Chinese army into alliance with the "Boxers"? And also, if that report be true, what is the present relation existing between the American forces and those of Great Britain, and whether the Americans are co-operating with the other Powers in the other steps proposed to be taken, or if America has declared a policy of its own in China.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): The hon. Gentleman the Member for King's Lynn has furnished the House with a very important statement in regard to the action of the Viceroys of the southern and central provinces of China; but I fear that these Viceroys will not be able to secure the restoration of order in the north. There are two great questions which we have now to consider. The first is the immediate question of the safety of the British Minister, and the other British and foreign residents in Peking. The other is the future settlement of the Chinese problem. I will only say one word in regard to the first, which is the cause of the very gravest anxiety. I wish to know why the Government have not invited three weeks ago, when they first knew the gravity of the situation, the only Power which is able to relieve the Legations in Peking, and possibly the only Power which is able to put an end to these disturbances in China—I refer to the Empire of Japan—to take action. There is not the slightest doubt that the Japanese have sufficient troops to march to Peking and put down any Chinese force which they may encounter between the sea and the capital of China. They have mobilised an army of 50,000 of the best disciplined troops in the East, and these could do all that is required. If Her Majesty's Government have allowed themselves to be pushed away from asking Japan to do what Japan alone is able to do efficiently and quickly, by the opposition of any European Power jealous of Japan, then they have incurred a great responsibility. I do not believe in this chimera of a European concert. I have never believed in it. I have watched this farce for years. I have seen its utter effeteness in Turkey, and I do not believe it will be any more successful, in the long run, in China. What this country wants in China is a clear and definite policy resolutely carried out—a British policy supported by all the support which Great Britain can obtain. I see no other way of relieving the Legations except by an immediate appeal to Japan. Whether Russia or France agrees or not, England and the other Powers should insist on urging Japan to interfere. That is what we owe to our Minister, to our fellow subjects, and to the Christian inhabitants in the north of China. I now go to the greater question, that of the future. What is to be our policy towards China? Well, I am afraid that neither of the two Front Benches have much ground for attacking each other upon their policy towards China. On that side I see right hon. Gentlemen who seven years ago, in 1893, allowed the greatest chance ever offered for settling the Russian menace against China——

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member will not be in order in discussing the general policy of this country towards China. The motion before the House only allows him to discuss the present position of the Legation in Peking.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I was unfortunate in not hearing the words of the motion. I understood the hon. Gentlemen who preceded me had been permitted to refer to the future arrangements in China. I was going to say that the loss of the opportunity of settling the Chinese question in 1893, and a similar blunder in 1898, when our ships were driven out of Port Arthur, is to be deeply regretted. But I will say no more about those lost opportunities. In regard to the saving of the Legations and the strengthening of the Government of China—questions of the greatest importance—the hon. Gentleman who moved the motion distinctly referred to the establishment of some kind of fresh Government in China, which should prevent the recurrence of these fatal disturbances and these attacks on foreign Ministers and foreign subjects. I believe that under a kind of tutelage by Great Britain, Japan, Germany, and the United States, a Government might be set up in China which the Chinese themselves would allow to be a national Government, and which might be encouraged for the cause of civilisation. We have heard a great deal of the good policy of the young Emperor. We do not know whether he is living or not, but we might do something to encourage him. And if we go to Peking, and if the Dowager Empress is willing to be the centre of reform, we might induce or even compel her to a beneficent policy. But the most fatal policy which we could adopt—a policy which has been openly avowed in some quarters of late—is that of the disintegration of China. That would be a fatal policy, would do us no good, and would alienate Japan, the United States, and probably Germany, and would unite the whole of China against this country. The suggestion that we should have a sphere of influence in the Yang-tsze valley——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is not complying with my ruling.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I again apologise. While I do not, Mr. Speaker, dispute your ruling, I am sure I have the sympathy of many hon. Gentlemen, who rarely have an opportunity of discussing this kind of question—an opportunity, however, which we have a right to exercise. Therefore, if on occasion when the great question of China is raised in a modest form, I think that even you, Sir, will allow me your sympathy at being restricted in my remarks by the rules of the House. The question before us, then, is the safety of the Legations and the restoration of order in China. The more this question is looked at the more it will be seen that the means I have suggested—namely, the intervention of Japan—is the only way of securing it. I know that the Government think a great deal of the Concert of Europe in this matter. But the Concert of Europe is a will-o'-the-wisp. The European forces may have fought together, but they are only small in number; and the most difficult questions will arise later. We know that there is the greatest jealousy on the part of Russia of any interference by Japan. But Russia itself is unable to send a sufficient force for the relief of the Legations. We hear a good deal of the great armies Russia has in North-eastern Asia. I doubt whether Russia has in all 80,000 troops there; and it is very doubtful whether she could send 20,000 for the relief of Peking, or even half that number. On the other hand, Japan could immediately put 50,000 or 60,000 troops, with artillery, transport, and everything complete, in the field. I venture to say that the result of that operation on the part of Japan would not only be the relief of the Legations in Peking, but would place in Peking a Power upon whose thorough friendship and fairness this country could rely.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has alluded to the difficulty private Members are in of bringing on questions of this character. I make no complaint of any advantage which may be taken of the rules of the House in order to elicit information with regard to China at this particular juncture. No one is better aware than I am of the grave anxiety which exists throughout the country at the present time as to the safety of the Legations, and also as to the preparations that Her Majesty's Government may have made. So far as it has been possible we have made no concealment from the House of Commons. We have from day to day given, as fully as we possibly could, the unfortunately very scant information which has reached us; but I very much doubt whether any good can be gained at this particular moment by an attempt to draw the Government into any discussion of policy with regard to the position in China. At the very moment when military operations are going on it is usually considered injudicious to forecast what may be the next step. At the best of moments the Government of China, or the position of affairs in China, or its Constitution, is not an exact science. At the present moment we are in a maze of uncertainties with regard to the position at Peking, and any forecast we may make as to the future must be based very much on information which must render it altogether unreliable. I doubt, therefore, whether it would be well for me to follow my hon. friend into some of the suggestions he has made, more especially as those suggestions are not altogether calculated to preserve that full concert and accord of the Powers which it is the great desire of Her Majesty's Government to secure at the present moment. But the hon. Member who moved the adjournment made one practical suggestion. I was a little surprised when he went back to the causes of this outbreak—I think that at this moment no discussion of those causes would throw very much light on the procedure which it is now desirable to adopt—and attributed it to the efforts of the concessionnaires and the pressure they wished should be brought to bear on the Chinese Government, seeing that there is no Member in the House who has invoked the good offices of the Foreign Office more frequently than the hon. Gentleman himself. But, speaking with a considerable experience of China, he urges us to consider the propriety of conferring on Li Hung Chang some special authority to act on behalf of the Powers in the preservation of order. I think it may be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to consider that among many other possible alternatives; but I certainly think it would not be our duty to pronounce any verdict on the feasibility of it, seeing that nearly every consideration as to the probable effect of it is at present hidden from us. My hon. friend has, in some respects, impeached the Government. His fear is that we have not taken sufficiently vigorous measures towards obtaining the support of the only Power which is, at this moment, capable of coming up in large numbers for the relief of the Legations. The question of calling in any particular Power is of itself a difficult one. The Government have, from the very first, from the 6th of June, when they gave full power to Sir Claude MacDonald and to Admiral Seymour to act according to their discretion for the relief and preservation of the Legations, communicated to other Powers consistently their desire that as full a force as was desired by the officers on the spot should without any delay be brought to bear. The hon. Member for East Mayo asked me whether the American Admiral had dissented from the other Powers in regard to the attack on the Ta-ku forts. We have no reason to suppose that there was any division of opinion between the Admirals on that point. Our information goes to show that the attack on the Ta-ku forts was not begun by the ships. The forts were being rapidly manned by soldiers, and their position would have made the position of the ships untenable, and, as a matter of fact, fire was opened by the forts on the allied fleet. So far as we are aware, the Americans, who had landed men already, and were proceeding to the relief of Peking with Admiral Seymour's force, took the same part as the other ships of the squadrons in resisting the forts.

MR. DILLON: Was not the fire opened upon the fleet only in reply to the ultimatum of the Powers that if the troops were not removed they would attack the forts in the morning?

*MR. BRODRICK: There is no doubt the Admirals originally made some communication to the forts; but, so far as we are aware, they acted entirely in concert. I believe the American Government are averse, as a rule, from entering into technical and diplomatic joint action; but they are acting in co-operation, exactly in the same way as the other Powers, with ourselves. My hon. friend asked why Her Majesty's Government had not called in the Japanese, and why they had not taken advantage of the proximity of Japan to urge them to throw in an overwhelming force at once for the relief of Peking. Her Majesty's Government have been in communication with all the Powers, including the Japanese Government. Their view has been throughout to give encouragement to any Power for the prompt despatch of any body of troops which they could send to meet the existing emergency at Peking. We made it perfectly clear to the Japanese Government that we hoped that they, having it in their power, owing to their proximity, and the circumstances which enable them to throw in a large force within a comparatively small number of days, would see their way to supplement considerably the contingent they had already landed. That communication was made to them some time ago.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Has any Power objected to that?

*MR. BRODRICK: We have no reason to think that any influence has been exerted by other Powers to discourage the Japanese Government from undertaking this work. My hon. friend has probably considered to some extent the military character of the problem. He will recollect that, while it is one thing to put troops on board ship, it is another to provide them with the commissariat and transport necessary for marching more than 100 miles through a hostile country. I need not remind the House that the circumstances in China at this moment may render it extremely difficult for a relief force to penetrate to the capital within a reasonable time. The period of rain has begun, the roads are practically impassable owing to the rains, and the railway has been rendered useless for the greater part of the way. Therefore the problem is not merely one of bringing a sufficient number of troops on the scene, but of providing them with all the details and the equipment necessary to convey a large army through a difficult country in the face of the enemy. Therefore I will ask my hon. friend to remember that the problem which we have to face, and have been facing for the last three weeks, is not so easy or so simple as, I think, he seems to imagine. I should like in a few words to explain to the House what has been done by Her Majesty's Government from the first in this matter. Practically the first warning of a serious crisis having arisen was on 20th May, when there was a meeting of the Corps Diplomatique, at which they decided that, unless the Chinese Government showed more vigour in bringing the existing state of disorder in Shan-tung, and about 90 miles from Peking to a close, it would be necessary to send for guards. Those guards were provided on 28th May. On 6th June full discretion was given to the Admiral and Sir Claude MacDonald; and on the 9th the admiral marched. Before that had taken place the Admiral had already anticipated possible difficulties by calling up seven ships to Ta-ku. Her Majesty's Government have since then made the following provision to meet the difficulty which has arisen: In the first place they called up nearly 1,000 troops from Hong Kong, and ordered them to be immediately replaced by 1,000 from India. These troops have been landed, and there are now nearly 2,000 men on shore, making with the contingents of other powers about 13,500. They have with them, I think, fifty-three field guns and thirty-six maxims. We have at this moment nine ships at Ta-ku, and twenty-five other ships on the China station. In addition to that other ships have been brought up from Manila and Singapore. The "Goliath" battleship, the "Dido," and "Isis," first-class cruisers, have all passed Aden on their way to China; the "Argonaut," first-class cruiser, has sailed from home; three ships have been ordered from Australia; two destroyers have been put in commission at Hong Kong; two further gun-vessels are being commissioned and will sail in a day or two; the second-class cruiser "Prospero" has been ordered to Han-kau and will be there in a very few days; the transport "Jelunga" has started from Southampton with 800 seamen and marines, and arrangements have been made to utilise her as a hospital ship if necessary. No doubt that is a force, so far as naval power goes, and so far as the object of protecting isolated treaty ports where foreigners are resident is concerned, that ought to enable us very shortly indeed to carry out any work that may be required of us in that respect. Beyond that the Government have put under orders 10,000 men from India, and the Indian Government, acting with their proverbial promptitude, have already succeeded in despatching four or five transports. Some of those troops will be at Hong Kong early next week. Therefore, so far as meeting the emergency with all the means in our power is concerned, I think the House will agree with the hon. Member for Barnsley that there has been no remissness on the part of Her Majesty's Government. But my hon. friend the Member for King's Lynn asked us to take a definite step in regard to our relations with the Viceroys on the Yang-tsze. He asked us to commit ourselves to them—to establish them, as it were, as the Government of China for the time being—and to give them any support they may stand in need of. The latter part of my hon. friend's request has already been done. We cannot at this moment decide what is the Government of China, or what persons may be trusted in regard to the Government of China, but before Sir Claude MacDonald was isolated in Peking he received instructions from Her Majesty's Government to do all in his power to place as full a force as the Admiral could supply him with in support of any Chinese authority in restoring law and order. The announcement made to Sir Claude MacDonald has also been made to the Viceroys of the Yang-tsze and the south. They have been informed that so long as they use their efforts for preservation of law and order Her Majesty's ships and Her Majesty's forces will, to the full extent which the officers in command consider possible, co-operate with them and use their power in that respect. It is impossible for us by any measures which we may now take short of the progress of the expedition which we still hope the Admirals may find it possible to undertake—it is impossible for us to do more than that towards the preservation of the lives of those who are isolated at different spots in China, and more especially at the Peking Legations. We cannot go further. The safety of the Legations and the preservation of order are the only points to which we can at this moment direct our attention. All other questions of policy, all the questions of the future government of China, must necessarily stand aside until we see what may be the result of the next few days or weeks. We may, of course, be on the eve of the complete disintegration of China from within. I am not speaking of any action by the Powers from without. We may have to face the problem of 400 millions of people either in civil war or, at all events, not obeying the central authority at Peking; but all those points must wait. We can at this moment do but one thing, and that is to direct all our energies to meeting the present emergencies to the best of our ability; and I believe, notwithstanding what has fallen from my hon. friend the Member for the Ecclesall Division, the House of Commons will agree with the Government in thinking that to meet those emergencies as they have arisen the first and most cardinal and most important point is that there should be the most complete accord between all the Powers. Our labours for the past few weeks have been unremittingly directed towards that end. Up to this moment there has been complete accord between the Powers as to the steps to be taken. We believe that the united forces belonging to six different nations have co-operated in the most loyal manner in each other's support. We believe that the officers in command of them have with the forces at their disposal done the very best they can to carry through a difficult and an almost impossible task. Beyond that I hope that the House will not expect me to go this afternoon. I only hope that the House will continue to have confidence in the Government. We will spare no effort and will strain every nerve in order to secure the relief of the Legations and also to prevent the trouble which has arisen in the north of China from spreading to the other provinces.

SIR EDWARD GREY (Northumberland, Berwick): China has been so much in our thoughts in the last few days that it is not unnatural that this debate should have arisen; but, although I feel it is not unnatural, it does seem to me that the present time is a peculiarly inconvenient one for speaking on the subject. I sympathise entirely with the right hon. Gentleman opposite in his reluctance to enter into details on any question of policy at the present moment. Her Majesty's Government have always told us that, so far as they are concerned, there will be no heart-burning, no jealousy, no reluctance to see any one of the Powers which is most capable of forwarding the work of rescue at Peking undertake a large share of responsibility. That is the utmost they can say, and it is the one thing needful to be said at the present moment. And I am sure, in the face of the news which has come to-day, all civilised Powers must feel that it would be a discredit to any one of them to adopt any other attitude. A few days ago our anxieties were concentrated upon the sufferings and the uncertainty of the fate of Admiral Seymour's force. To-day our sympathy has been aroused by the news of the blow which has fallen on Germany, and that news has quickened and painfully heightened our anxiety as to what may be the fate of our own Minister and others in Peking from whom we have no news. In face of that, we surely must feel that the one thing urgent is the work of rescue. That cannot be otherwise than impeded if there be any difference amongst the Powers. The one thing for the moment is that they should all be united in forwarding that work; and it is because I feel that the discussion of any further question of policy might possibly, by raising afterthoughts in the minds of others, impair their agreement and concentration upon the work of the moment, that I think this is a time at which to say as little as possible. After the work of rescue is over, which mercifully we hope may still be done in time, there will come the question of reparation; and I will only say that I hope the Powers will be able, when the question of reparation does arise, to so adjust their measures that the burden may fall upon the guilty parties who are really responsible. When we come to the further question which may arise in the future I would only say this much—that, although, of course, we expect Her Majesty's Government, considering our great interest in China, to be more than a lay figure in the concert, yet we are anxious that they shall do everything in their power to preserve that concert beyond the need of the present moment. And when they do exercise their influence in the concert I trust it will be in the direction of doing all in their power to avert anything like the partition of China, which, if it were the outcome of present disasters, would I am sure be a calamity to every one interested.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

NEW BILL.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION.

Bill to consolidate and amend the Law relating to the protection of Wild Birds, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bigwood, Mr. Howard, Mr. Buxton, and Sir John William Maclure.

WILD BIRDS PROTECTION BILL.

"To consolidate and amend the Law relating to the Protection of Wild Birds." presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 281.]

QUEEN ANNE'S BOUNTY JOINT COMMITTEE.

Ordered, That Sir William Anson, Mr. Humphreys-Owen, Mr. W. F. D. Smith, Mr. Stevenson, and Mr. Stuart-Wortley be members of the Joint Committee on Queen Anne's Bounty.—(Sir William Walrond.)

TITHE RENT-CHARGE (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. SPEAKER: There is upon the Paper an Instruction in the name of the hon. Member for East Mayo. The rule as to Instructions for dividing a Bill into two Bills is that the Bill must either be one which is in two parts itself, or which relates to two separate and distinct subject-matters, so that it may naturally and easily be divided into two Bills. It appears to me that this Bill is a Bill for giving relief or concessions to the tithe-payers in Ireland, and although the first section proposes to give a special relief to a special class of tithe-payers, this does not constitute such a creation of two distinct matters as to facilitate a division into separate Bills. Therefore I am of opinion that the Instruction is out of order; but I may point out that the same result may be obtained by striking out the first clause and amending the definition clause by amendments in Committee.

Bill considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) in the Chair.]

Clause 1:—

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 9, after 'rent-charge' to insert 'and the land has not been, since the date of such order, conveyed to any person on a sale thereof.'"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE CHIEF SECRETARY OF STATE FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central), who was indistinctly heard, said this question did not appear to be quite so simple as the hon. and learned Gentleman apparently thought. There might be some justification for the Amendment on the ground that persons who had purchased an estate since 1872 upon which tithes were payable knew the exact position, and that any repayment or annuity payable out of the estate would have to be paid; but, on the other hand, hon. Members must remember the person who suffered the hardship was the vendor of the estate. He did not think it was possible to admit the principle of the hon. Gentleman's Amendment as regards estates sold between 1872 and 1896, but he was prepared to consider the question raised by this and the later Amendment which the hon. Gentleman had set down before the Report stage, with a view to its being dealt with in one clause.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) did not consider that the Report stage was the proper stage for the consideration of a matter of the kind raised by the Amendment he proposed. This was admittedly a blot upon the Bill, and it was essential that it should be remedied. If the Government were determined to pass a Bill against the wishes or desires of the Irish people by which a million and a quarter was to be given to the landlords, he would suggest that the Government should also at the same time give say £200,000 to tenants. He would be quite willing to withdraw his Amendment upon the promise of the right hon. Gentleman to put a clause into the Bill, of which fair notice had been given, if it were brought in before the conclusion of the Committee stage, so that it might be fairly discussed. The question before the Committee was one which greatly affected the Irish tenants. The Government passed for the benefit of those tenants the fortieth section of the Act of 1896. He voted against that section because he believed that instead of working for the benefit of the tenants it would work in favour of Irish land values, which, unfortunately, had been the case. Instead of the tenants getting the land which they desired, the Act had been availed of to put over the heads of the tenants, after they had made a market, these land grabbers. It was not the landlords who made the trouble, but the land grabbers, and those were the persons who were now to receive a bonus of 25 per cent. on their tithe rent charge, although they were clearly purchasers with notice. Take the case of the sale of the Muckross Estate, which had been purchased by Lord Ardilaun for £500,000; was he to receive a reduction of 25 per cent. in his tithe rent-charge because the men who lived on the bogs on his estate received 25 per cent. reduction on their rents? Was he in the same position as the ancient landed gentry, who had held their land since the time of Cromwell, in whose favour, perhaps, something might be said? The same state of things was going on all over the country, and, in his opinion, it was

* The notice was as follows:—"That it be an instruction to the Committee to divide the Bill into two Bills, one dealing with the case of lay impropriate tithe-payers and the other with the case of ecclesiastical tithe-payers."

most unjust. Not only were these people to get out of paying their tithes, but at the end of a number of years payment was to be cut down by seven years. Supposing the Committee were dealing with an English Bill, and a man went to Tokenhouse Yard and purchased a property to be paid for by fifteen annual instalments; was it just that a Bill should be brought in the next year whereby those fifteen annual instalments should be reduced to eight? That is what the Bill now under consideration did. He had not put the case for the Irish landlords who had struggled and gone down; they might have an arguable case, but these people had no case at all. In 1869 the present Chancellor of the Exchequer denounced the action of Mr. Gladstone as sacrilege; were they now to give the benefit of that sacrilege to the persons who purchased their property the day before yesterday? When Mr. Gladstone was pulling down the Irish Church he was destroying an ancient institution, though he did his best to be friendly with his enemies; but he would turn in his grave if he thought that these persons were going to benefit by his action. Much as he (Mr. Healy) objected to the Bill, he had put down no Amendments of an obstructive kind. The Amendment before the Committee was of a businesslike character, and, if the right hon. Gentleman could not accept it at the moment, he would withdraw it upon the promise of the right hon. Gentleman that he would bring in a clause during the Committee stage of the Bill, when it could be dealt with in a businesslike manner.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): This Amendment is a valuable one, forming as it does a test of the bona fides of the Bill. We are told by the Chief Secretary that the Bill is introduced simply for the purpose of remedying a grievance. The hon. Member for North Louth brings in at the outset of the discussion an Amendment which deals with a case which the Government did not foresee. If this Bill is to remedy a grievance, why do not the Government accept this Amendment?—because the Government surely will not contend there is any grievance so far as the people who bought since 1872 are concerned; and it is quite true, as the hon. Member for North Louth said, that the land-grabbers who purchased estates in this way had purchased them recently. But there were a great many purchases of estates before the purchase Acts were introduced. In the interval which elapsed between 1872 and 1885 there were a great many people who purchased upon notice as regards the burdens that this clause deals with, and therefore the Government cannot contend for a moment that they have any grievance whatever. The particular clause we are now discussing deals with cases of terminable annual instalments. There is no question as to the tithe rent-charge. There was previously a variable charge, but it has now become an invariable charge. There is only the annual instal ment by which these people purchased their tithes. As regards this clause it cannot be pretended that any person who has bought an estate in Ireland has any grievance whatever to complain of. I cannot imagine that the Government can offer any reason for objecting at all events to the principle of the Amendment.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am ready to meet, as far as I can, the views of the hon. Member for North Louth. The Government will draw up a clause dealing with this question, as well as the subsequent question raised by the hon. Member, and will give sufficient time for the House to consider it. I hope, on the other hand, that this particular bone of contention is removed for the present, and that the Government will be able to get the Bill through Committee this evening. I think I ought to say that while I will endeavour to meet the views of the hon. Member as far as possible, I do not wish him to be under the impression that I am giving a pledge beyond what I have already indicated as to the date of limitation. I will endeavour to frame a new clause which shall meet the case as far as equity requires.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): I think it would be much more satisfactory if the Government or the Committee were now to dispose of this Amendment. It must be borne in mind that it is not merely the hon. Member for Louth, or even hon. Members below the gangway, who are interested in this question, but that every Member of this House is more or less interested in the question which will ultimately, or may ultimately, affect the Imperial taxes; because every penny that is taken away from the Church Fund by the operation of this Bill diminishes the security which the British taxpayer has now in case of default being made in the caraying out of the Land Purchase Acts of Ireland. Therefore I do not think it is satisfactory of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to say, "If you are satisfied with my engagement to bring up a particular clause you must give me an undertaking that the debate will close to-night." I confess that, for my part, I will give no such undertaking. I disapprove of the clause in toto, but assuming that, for the purpose of this Amendment, that clause will stand, I wish to point out why I think the Amendment of my hon. and learned friend the Member for North Louth hould be adopted by the House. I do not think many Members of the House exactly understand the case. It must be borne in mind that redemption of tithe rent-charge was a voluntary act on the part of the tithe-payers, after the passing of the Irish Church Act of 1869. No tithe-payer was bound to come forward and enter into that arrangement by which the tithe was redeemable at the end of fifty-two years, or any other time. It was altogether optional. He might have gone on paying the rent-charge as before. This was a privilege given to them either to redeem by twenty-two and a half year's purchase, or instead of that, by paying an annuity terminable at the expiration of fifty-two years from the date of the order, and calculated on the basis of £4 9s. per cent. That was altogether a voluntary act. I know many tithe-payers who redeemed by paying twenty-two and a half years purchase. There is no relief offered to them. There is no restitution made or sought to be made to them.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the right hon. Gentleman is now dealing with the point in the Amendment. I think the right hon. Gentleman might confine himself to that.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: It is impossible to illustrate my argument by always confining myself to the particular words of the Amendment. I am illustrating the argument that the persons who elected to convert their tithe rent-charge into this terminable annuity were volunteers. They were under no compulsion to do so, and the State owes nothing to them any more than the State owes anything to those who put their hands into their pockets to redeem the tithe rent-charge by paying twenty-two and a half years purchase. I happen myself to have done that many years ago. It never occurred to me that under any circumstances the House of Commons would give me the opportunity of getting a rebate on that amount. It is stated that the land is sold subject to this terminable annuity of fifty-two years, calculated at £4 9s. per cent., and that the purchaser, when calculating the purchase money, pays so much less because of that burden being on the estate, and why should he now get the benefit? It is really the vendors who would be entitled to that benefit. The vendors twenty or thirty years ago would be the persons entitled to get this drawback. The purchaser, with his eyes open, bought the estate subject to this charge, and now why should the person who so purchased—it may have passed through intermediate hands—get so much knocked off the purchase money? It appears to me the most illogical and unreasonable thing ever brought into Parliament in that respect. This Amendment would go a very short way to remedy the illogical nature, and the unjust nature, of the measure, but it would go some way, and at all events it would indicate that as regards those persons who were in possession of estates, or their immediate successors since 1869, who have not done anything either to redeem the tithe rent-charge, or to convert it into a terminable annuity, and who have suffered from the reduction of the rents paid by the occupying tenants, there might be some reason for saying that they should come in and get the benefit of that Act, but those who have purchased land on a particular basis, and who took the property subject to that charge are, it appears to me, on an altogether different footing. I trust that this Amendment will be accepted by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE (Antrim, N.): I should like to make a few observations on the Amendment. I think the object which the hon. Member for North Louth has announced as his object for moving the Amendment can be met without going a considerable distance in what seems to me to be a dangerous direction. The present state of things arose owing to a miscalculation. The hon. Member for North Louth will admit that. [Mr. HEALY: No!] He does not admit it, but we on this side of the House say that the term of fifty-two years ought to have been forty-five years, and, as I understand, whether that assumption is right or wrong, the hon. Member for North Louth does not object to the application of this section in the case of those parties in whose possession the land was originally. But this Amendment deals with those cases where the land has, since the order, changed hands. If the original owner is entitled to the relief the Bill gives, surely it would follow that any person who purchased his land would be entitled to whatever rights, as an ordinary matter of the law of property, the original owner might have. The hon. Member for North Louth objects to the clause because a land corporation or speculators may have come in and purchased the land, and it seems to me he makes a fair enough case for excluding that class of persons. I do not think any one can blame the procedure of the Land Judges Court, because it is the duty of a Land Judge to get all the money he can for the parties concerned. He is bound to realise at the highest price, no matter from what quarter it comes. But the 40th Section is not used to facilitate land purchases, and I would suggest that to meet the difficulty the hon. Member has stated as arising from the transactions of the Land Judges Court this Amendment should be limited to people who have come in over the tenants' heads. There may be a difficulty if you are going to apply it to every case of sale. Sale is a large word. There may be cases where there has been a mortgage, and where the mortgagee has foreclosed and come in. This is the way to meet the grievance to which the hon. Member for North Louth refers. I think that to do otherwise would be to go a considerable way in a dangerous direction.

MR. T. M. HEALY: If I make a bargain by which I undertake to pay a certain number of annual or monthly instalments, it would be intolerable that an Act of Parliament should be brought in, and that I should be relieved out of the public funds of seven of these instalments. That is the proposition made here. I remember what the Chancellor of the Exchequer said the other day when we pressed him about the income tax. We said the income tax under the arrangement made at the time of the Union was not payable in Ireland as it was in England or Scotland. His reply was: "When I find millionaires and speculators drawing large incomes in Ireland, why should not I make them pay income tax as in England and Scotland?" When you find millionaires picking up property in the open market, is it tolerable that you should consent to seven of their instalments being knocked off out of the public pocket? It is the most extravagant, erratic, and burlesque proposal I ever heard of. I felt it to be a grievance that I should have to pay anything towards the war in South Africa, because I did not contract it. These people entered into a contract by which they were subject to pay so many years instalments, and the Government now turned round and said they would, out of their kindness, let them off seven instalments, not out of English, but out of Irish money. The hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh once said—

> "Whenever England wants to wipe away a tear from the eye of Ireland she is always careful to make Ireland pay for the pocket-handkerchief."

It is one of the truest things ever said, and it is not the less true because it was said by the hon. and gallant Gentleman. They are ready enough to remedy the mistakes made against Irish millionaires when they have an intolerable grievance, but why do they not remedy the mistakes made against the Irish National teachers? When they make mistakes against Irish landlords they remedy them out of Irish funds, and the Government are now making an assault upon the one petty little fund available in Ireland for education, in order to let the gentlemen who bought this land off seven years instalments. The English Government do many grotesque things, but I do not think that they ever in their wildest moments did anything like this. I can say no more. You can pass anything with regard to Ireland through this House. There was a time when these things caused amusement, but nothing amuses anybody now. You give Ireland £30,000 or £40,000 out of this fund to teach us how to churn butter one year, and the year after you take away from us £1,500,000. If this grievance exists, why do you not remedy it out of the English funds? Why does the right hon. Gentleman not insist that the English should buy the pocket-handkerchief? He said that upon the hustings.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Antrim, N.): No. I said that in the House of Commons.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Well, then, you must have repeated it in the House. The Government in this matter have acted in a manner which is absolutely incomprehensible, for there was no pressure put upon them in regard to these new speculators. A more monstrous proposition never emanated from any Government.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) asked what understanding had been come to between the Chief Secretary and the hon. Member for North Louth.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The understanding is that at the end of the Committee stage I shall bring forward a new clause dealing with the question raised in the present Amendment. I understand that, under those circumstances, the hon. and learned Member for North Louth consents to the Committee stage being finished to-night.

MR. DILLON: I did not understand at all that the hon. Member for North Louth went so far as the right hon. Gentleman says. The hon. Member for North Louth made some observations as to the possibility of the Bill passing through Committee to-night, but that depends on the course of the discussion. Of course, if the Government are prepared to give any fair concessions, to meet our Amendments in a reasonable spirit, the Bill would pass more rapidly.

MR. FLYNN said the more this clause was considered the more the justice of the Amendment must become apparent. There were cases in which speculators came in and bought land over the heads of the unfortunate tenants, and it was not fair that they should get the benefit of this clause. He thought that they were more than justified in insisting that there should be a discussion on this clause, and that the consideration of the new clause should not be relegated to the hour of midnight. Something ought to be done to meet the views of those who were in favour of what seemed on all hands to be a most logical and proper Amendment.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) said that if what the Chief Secretary had stated did not carry out fully the views of the hon. Member for North Louth, it would at all events give a very large measure of what he desired. As he understood the arrangement, it was that the Committee stage should be finished that night, with the exception of the new clause which the Chief Secretary had undertaken to bring up, the discussion on which should be taken early on Thursday.

MR. T. M. HEALY said that his Amendment would be accepted in principle, and therefore, so far as he was concerned, he accepted the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. He begged leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DILLON: We shall have an opportunity of discussing the Clause as a whole later on, and the Amendment I rise to move touches only in a very slight degree the principle of the clause. I desire at the very earliest moment to reply to the statement that the clause itself and the demand of the Irish landlords upon which it is founded spring from a miscalculation made in the settlement of 1869. There is not a shadow of foundation for that statement. It rests upon an absolute invention which was first heard of thirty years after that settlement was arrived at, and which till then had never been stated by the Irish landlords or anybody on their behalf. The point was raised in the House of Lords in 1894 by Lord Belmore when he asked why the Treasury in 1869 recommended the Government to alter the terms of the annuity of £4 10s., including interest at 3½ per cent. for forty-five years, to an annuity of £4 9s. for fifty-two years, and he insinuated at the time that there had been a miscalculation on the part of the Treasury. Here is the answer of the Treasury in the Memorandum of June, 1895—

"The Land Commissioners have recommended that in such cases the terms of redemption of the perpetual tithe should be reduced from twenty-two and a half years' purchase, the rate prescribed by the Acts of 1869 and 1872, to twenty years' purchase, but the Treasury have not felt justified in concurring in this proposal. The primary reason which led this Board and their predecessors to that conclusion was the very serious loss which this proposal, and the consequences which might be apprehended from it, would inflict on the Church Fund. The possible amount of that loss was estimated by the Land Commission in 1888 at £845,000, supposing the concession limited to the tithe only, without application to other portions of the Church property; and it may be taken as certain that no such amount could now be surrendered without serious risk to the solvency of the Church Fund. Other considerations, however, affecting the proposal on its merits cannot be overlooked, two of which the First Lord may place on record:—

> "(1) It is in effect a compulsory reduction of the (statutory) value of one particular charge on the land—namely, that held in trust for Irish public purposes, unaccompanied by any suggestion of reduction in other and less will-secured charges such as mortgages. Measuring the security of a charge by the rate of interest which it carries this proposal would treat the tithe as a 5 per cent. charge, and, therefore, as being no better secured than mortgages carrying 5 per cent. interest, and worse secured than those carrying 4½ per cent. As all such mortgages are posterior to tithe the First Lord thinks that the statutory price of twenty-two and a half years' purchase, implying interest at 4½ per cent., is not illiberal to the tithe payer in view of the ordinary rates of interest on mortgages on Irish land.
> "(2) This proposal to treat the tithe as no better secured than a 5 per cent. charge is in striking contrast to the suggestion that loans from the Church Fund on precisely the same security should be made at a rate not exceeding 3½ or even 3 per cent., which rates involve a high estimate of the security. It would be extremely illogical, apart from other objections, to apply simultaneously both these methods of relieving the tithe-payer at the cost of the Church Fund.

"In conclusion, the First Lord desires to remark that he has endeavoured in this memorandum to distinguish between the matters for which the Board is, and those for which it is not, responsible. In the case of the former, it is their Lordships' duty to defend their own decisions; but as to the latter, it is only necessary to state facts and figures for the consideration of the Legislature."

For thirty years this tithe rent-charge was accepted as a first statutory charge on the land of the owners who were subject to it without any complaint or suggestion that it was otherwise than fair and legal. What is the nature of the clause we are now discussing? Under the Church Act of 1869, by Clause 32 the tithe rent-charge payers of Ireland were entitled, if they so desired, to redeem the tithe rent-charge by an annual payment for fifty-two years equal to the perpetual payment to which they were subject. There was no question of the amount of interest or sinking fund, but they were given permission as a bribe to get rid of a perpetual charge on their estates by a terminable annuity extending over fifty-two years. What landlord or private individual owning property is there in this House who would not accept such a generous settlement? Moreover, no Irish landlord was compelled to accept those terms. After the clause was passed any landlord who redeemed on those terms entered into a voluntary contract with the Church Fund and the Government—a contract which he was bound to observe. Landlords were subject to the tithe rent-charge to the extent of nearly half the revenue of the Church Fund arising from tithe redeemed, and we have to remember the extent to which that redemption has gone and the amount of the present terminable annuities. According to the report of the Comptroller and Auditor General on Church Temporalities in Ireland for the year ending 31st March, 1898, the annuities amounted to £167,717 per annum. Therefore, what is proposed in this clause is to strike off seven instalments of those annuities. I am going to move an Amendment which will have this effect—that instead of presenting to the Irish landlords a sum of considerably over £1,000,000, we should content ourselves with giving them a sum of £167,000, that is to say, one annual instalment instead of seven. Although I do not intend on this Amendment to raise the whole question of the principle of the clause, I have thought it right to take the opinion of the House on this particular question, so that if we are to make any gift at all to the Irish landlords it shall be not £1,200,000, but only £167,000. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 10, to leave out the words 'forty-five,' and insert the words 'fifty-one.'" —(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the words 'forty-five' stand part of the Clause."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The hon. Member for East Mayo said he did not desire to discuss the principle of the clause on this Amendment, but it appeared to me that at least four-fifths of the speech to which we have listened was, as a matter of fact, devoted to the general principle of the clause, and not to the Amendment. With respect to the Amendment I will only say that the case for reducing the number of years purchase to fifty-two was thought at the time to be overwhelming, but that was because a miscalculation was made. If we were to accept the hon. Member's Amendment to reduce the number of annual instalments by one, we should be cutting the ground from under our own feet; therefore, it is not an Amendment the Government could possibly accept.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) wished in the strongest way permitted by Parliamentary language to deny the assertion that there was any miscalculation in this matter. Lord Belmore, who was the first to start this claim, was a young man in the House of Lords at the time the Church Act was passed, but he did not oppose the settlement. A very eminent landlord on the opposite side of the House voted for the disestablishment of the Irish Church, but he never saw that he was being robbed, or that a mistake was being made. The hon. Member himself could remember the fearful prophecies that were made at the time of the passage of the Church Act as to what would become of the funds of the Irish Church; it was said that the money would go to the building of lunatic asylums and lighthouses and so on, but instead of that it was being used to make presents to the landlords. This was not the first time that that which belonged to the Irish people had been taken and given to a class of land-jobbers, but he defied anybody to find, in the whole English Statute-book, a proposal more audacious than that now before the Committee. Without difficulty he could make a list of under thirty names which would comprise the men who would benefit the most by this Bill, and no fewer than five members of Her Majesty's Government would by it shovel public money into their own pockets.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Member is hardly addressing himself to the Amendment.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said he was addressing himself to the monetary interest of the members of the Government in this proposal. He should resist this Bill by every means in his power, and when it was passed denounce it on every possible occasion throughout the country.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: I think there are one or two matters in reference to this Amendment on which the Committee ought to be informed before they come to a decision. The Chief Secretary has stated that the fifty-two years was based originally on a miscalculation, but he has not informed the Committee what that miscalculation was or wherein the error consisted. I apprehend that it was an arbitrary figure determined upon, when giving an option to tithe-payers which they might either adopt or refuse. I presume the right hon. Gentleman will state to the House how he makes out that this was an actuarial error. The other matter upon which I should like a little information is this. At present the great majority of tithe rent-charges in Ireland have not been either redeemed or converted into terminable annuities. Will this section enable future buyers to get this advantage?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: No.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: Then it ought to be so worded. Is it altogether retrospective?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Clause 4 is.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: Clause 4 is only in regard to redemptions. There is nothing to prevent a person who is now liable to pay the regular tithe rent-charge as fixed by the Act of 1872, coming in the day after this Bill is passed, and converting that into a terminable annuity.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): My right hon. friend is quite mistaken; he is led entirely astray in his remarks by the assumption that this payment is not a sale. There is no difference between a sale when you pay cash down, and a sale when the purchase money is in annuities. Both are sales within the express wording of the Act.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: I do not agree with my right hon. friend. There is no definition of "sale" in the Act. There will be exactly the same happen as was the case with the Land Act of 1896; it will be a puzzle for the Courts to solve.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I think this should be discussed on the clause itself, and not on the Amendment, and the hon. Member for East Mayo has succeeded in getting a double discussion on the principle of the clause. As, however, he has insisted on raising this point, let me at once say that, if the right hon. Gentleman opposite will read Section 32 of the Irish Church Act, 1869, he will see that what is contemplated is a sale. I think the right hon. Gentleman will now admit that in both cases, whether the payment is by a lump sum or by annuity, it is a sale.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: I think it is very ambiguous, and it ought to be made clear.

MR. DILLON: The right hon. Gentleman has made the charge against me that in moving this Amendment I have got a double discussion on the principle of this clause. I particularly said that I intended to be brief, and I was brief, because I did not want to discuss the principle of the clause. But this Amendment plainly involves that principle. The principle of the clause is to make a further gift to people who have no claim whatever to such a gift, and it is perfectly legitimate in a few words to show that that is the principle, and therefore is a ground for reducing the amount of that gift. If the gift is to be made at all it will be less objectionable if the amount is £167,000 instead of £1,200,000. The right hon. Gentleman has referred to a point which I intended to raise—namely, that the transaction we are now called upon to undo was a sale, and a sale carried out in most cases thirty years ago. It was no miscalculation, but a sale carried out at twenty-two and a half years purchase, the landlord being allowed to borrow the money from the Church Fund at a very low rate of interest to pay for the thing he had bought. There is overwhelming force in the case put forward by the right hon. Gentleman below me of those who put their hands into their pockets and paid cash.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is quite mistaken.

MR. DILLON: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean to say that nobody paid for their tithe rent-charge in cash?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Those who redeemed their tithe rent-charge in cash in 1872 redeemed the net tithe rent-charge and not the gross.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid) supported the Amendment on the ground that it was the lesser of two evils. He objected entirely to the principle at the bottom of this proposal, and could not make out why the Government, without any pressure from any quarter, should wish to disturb a settlement of such a character. Such a course was not in the interest of any great public policy, and it certainly would not pacify the country. He was rather curious to know what defence the right hon. Gentleman would make for carrying out such a settlement. He claimed that he was doing it as an act of justice, but he did not see where the injustice of the present system came in. These parties entered into their contracts voluntarily, and they did so because they thought it would be profitable, and why should they now put their hands into the purse of the Irish nation? He desired most earnestly to support the Amendment of his hon. friend, which he hoped would be pressed to a division.

Question put.

Captain Donelan and Mr.
Flavin.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 10, after the word 'forty-five,' to insert the word 'annual.'"—(Mr. T. M. Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I do not think this Amendment is at all necessary, and I think it would be very reasonable to leave the clause as it is.

MR. T. M. HEALY: But I want to know what is the exact meaning of it.

MR. ATKINSON said the Act provided that the annual sum should continue to be paid for only forty-five payments instead of fifty-two, and it was entirely unnecessary to repeat the word "annual."

MR. T. M. HEALY: I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. DILLON said that under the settlement of 1872 the payer of tithe rent-charge had three courses open to him: (1) He could buy the tithe rent-charge at twenty-two and a half years purchase; (2) he could buy it by fifty-two years instalments; or (3) he could agree with the commissioners to pay a sum somewhat larger than that to which he was subject, and have a shorter term fixed than fifty-two years, at the end of which his annuity would expire. He did not know how many acted upon this third plan. The second sub-section proposed to extend to the purchasers of tithe rent-charge who elected to adopt the increased payment to shorten the term, a concession similar to that proposed by the first sub-section to those who adopted twenty-two and a half years annuities. This second sub-section simply proposed to slice off a portion of this fund and distribute it among the supporters of the Government in Ireland. The proposal was utterly indifferent as to doing equal justice between the gentlemen who were to have this distribution. The man who purchased his tithe rent-charge for cash got nothing, and if he bought it for an annuity at not more than thirty years he also got no relief. But if he bought it at less than thirty years he got a concession, and if he bought it at a number of years extending to fifty-two then he got seven years taken off. The Amendment he proposed was to deal with short term annuitants on the same principle as it was proposed to deal with long term annuitants.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 20, to leave out the word 'ten' and insert the word 'fifteen.'"—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'ten' stand part of the clause."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said the hon. Member for East Mayo was entirely in error in supposing that the Bill made a distinction between those who purchased for cash and those who made a special arrangement. Those who purchased their tithe rent-charge for cash subsequent to 1872 paid cash less the amount of the poor rate, or in other words they paid for the net tithe rent-charge. If the provisions of this Bill were carried out the same treatment would be meted out to those paying off the charge by means of annuities. The object of the clause was to put those who had contracted for a shorter period upon the same footing as those who had arranged for fifty-two years. The change suggested by this Amendment would place at a disadvantage those who made arrangements to pay off at shorter periods.

MR. DILLON said this was simply begging the whole question. It was contended that for thirty years they had been charged at the rate of fifty-two years when they should only have been charged forty-five years, and now after thirty years these extraordinary statisticians had made this discovery. In regard to the Treasury Minute of 1895 they had been told that there was a complete change in the personnel, but up to that hour they had never had a single argument or memorandum to justify that total change of policy. Now they had made this extraordinary discovery, to buy off Lord Ardilaun and the Dublin Daily Express. The right hon. Gentleman had not given a single word of explanation in regard to Sub-section 2, which appeared to him to be preposterous, and the whole clause as it stood was most absurd. It was now proposed to make this enormous concession to those who had already been allowed to borrow State money at £3 16s. 3d. per cent. They had already got that advantage over cash buyers, and they were now to get the additional advantage of an enormous reduction in the annuity. He should insist upon pressing his Amendment to a division.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: The right hon. Gentleman referred to some speech made by Mr. Gladstone as a ground for saying that there was an actuarial error. I wish to remind the hon. Gentleman that Mr. Gladstone's statement was made in 1869, but what we are dealing with now is what was done by Section 7 of the Irish Church Amendment Act in the year 1872, and there is nothing whatsoever to indicate that that Act was based upon an actuarial or any other error. It is necessary to call the attention of the Committee to the words of that Act, because it shows how very arbitrary this reduction of the interest is to £3 10s. The Act declared the purchase money payable by instalments for fifty-two years at £4 9s. per cent. on the purchase money, or for such less number of years as might be agreed upon as an equivalent annual sum so as to discharge the principal and interest in a less number of years. That is the provision to which this point has reference. What grounds are there for altering this section and fixing £3 10s. as the arbitrary sum? We have no statistics or figures in regard to these annuities, and here we are asked in this arbitrary way to give the benefit to these persons by introducing this arbitrary figure, for which no reason is assigned. I shall, therefore, vote for this Amendment if it goes to a division.

MR. ARCHDALE (Fermanagh, N.) said he hoped the Chief Secretary would press his opposition to this Amendment. He had not the honour of knowing Lord Ardilaun, but he knew that his Lordship made good and charitable use of his money both in Ireland and in this country. He thought the clause was an attempt to remedy a gross injustice.

MR. T. M. HEALY: The action of the Government in this matter reminds me of bimetallism. One day a member of the Government announces he is in favour of the gold standard, and next day he goes down to Lancashire and receives light on the subject, and then announces he is in favour of the fifteen to one ratio. What I should like to know is, when did the Government receive grace in regard to this gross injustice; when did the light of justice first shine upon their souls? I remember the long line of Chief Secretaries who have preceded the right hon. Gentleman; he has blasphemed them all in this Bill. I have been making a list of the number of English statesmen whom we have been asked to look up to, and to whom I have been asked many times to go down on my intellectual knees. Now I learn that they were wrong all the time, and I am told that when I was asked to respect law and order I was asked to respect a gross injustice and a fraud on the Irish landlords. Here is a list of the Irish Chief Secretaries for the last thirty years: Mr. Fortescue, Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Mr. James Lowther, Mr. Forster, Sir George Trevelyan, Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, Mr. J. Morley, Sir W. Hart Dyke, Mr. W. H. Smith, Mr. John Morley; again Sir Michael Hicks Beach, Mr. A. J. Balfour, and Mr. John Morley. They have all been engaged in perpetrating a most heinous wrong on a most deserving class of the community, and what is more, an irreparable wrong, because many men sold their land, and did not get full value for it. What about the Duke of Devonshire, who sold land in Cork, and Lord Derby, who sold his estate in the county of Tipperary? Look at the appalling injustice done to them; they gave away their estates, so to speak, with a pound of tea and without any consideration for the seven years compensation now to be made to their successors. The Duke of Devonshire sold his estates, and the man who succeeded to them now gets a seven years bonus, and the Duke has been grievously wronged by the Government of which he is a member. I feel appalled when I think of the black injustice which has been done to the landlords who have endeavoured to get rid of the landlordism by selling their estates. The old stock has gone, and none of them have got the benefit of this seven years bonus. Who was it that discovered this grievance; who was this financial Christopher Columbus who, embarking on the dark seas of finance, discovered it? Is his name to remain silent? Are not the present landlords entitled to know to whom their gratitude is to be given, and are not the men who sold out entitled to know to whom their curses are to be awarded? The right hon. Gentleman has taken it upon himself to reverse the policy of his predecessors; but, at all events, he has given a blow to the famous doctrine that the British Government in Ireland is a continuity. Let every Irish tenant take heart. He may be smarting under unjust laws, and he may be told that it is quite right to pay his rent, but some new Chief Secretary may arise—perhaps in an Irish Parliament—and may be able to announce that he has found salvation, that he has adopted the doctrine of repudiation, and that from the depths of his inner consciousness he finds that the tenants should be relieved of seven years annuity or perhaps seven years payment of rent. If this doctrine is to prevail now, why should it not be enacted later that for seven years every man, woman, and child in Ireland should not be liable for rent, rates, or taxes? There would be just as much reason for that as there is for the provision in this Bill. Remember that the original Act was an arbitrary one, and no one could say whether the purchase price should be 22½ years or 42½ years. It had to be arrived at in an empirical manner. If it were found that the landlords should have paid forty years purchase, would you bring in a Bill to compel them to make restitution now? Would that not be as sound and logical a proposition as that now made; because, starting as you did from an empirical standard, you now contend that your empiricism was founded on justice. I cannot understand how a man with the logical mind of the right hon. Gentleman can stand up and advance such a proposition without laughing. If I were an English statesman I should say, "I have got a troublesome gang to deal with in Ireland. Lord Ardilaun has bought the Daily Express; when the Vice-President of the Board of Agriculture had it things were amicable and pleasant, but now I must give them something." I can thoroughly understand that; but to invent an injustice, and now propose to make up for it in sackcloth and ashes, not at your own expense, but at ours, and to ask us to accept this absurdity is, even for an Irish Member, a little too much. I must say for myself that the only fault I find with the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Mayo is that it is too moderate. I feel inclined to denounce it as giving the whole case away. At all events, whatever may be said for the Amendment, the proposition in the Bill is one which no serious statesman should endeavour to defend.

MR. DILLON: I maintain, after listening carefully to the statement of the right hon. Gentleman, that the second sub-section of this clause will be positive nonsense if this Amendment is not accepted. The whole of this question is very complicated, and must be examined very closely before it is understood. The section applies to men who agreed to buy their tithe rent-charge at twenty-two and a half years purchase. Then came a subsidiary agreement that that twenty-two and a half years purchase should be paid in instalments. For the sake of illustration, let us assume that an agreement was entered into for an annuity extending over thirty-one years. What does the right hon. Gentleman propose to do in that case? If the agreement were made in 1870 the last annuity would be payable next year. He says that the Treasury should go back on this transaction and should recalculate it on the supposition that it was not £3 16s. 3½d. but £3 10s. per cent. that should have been charged, and that the sinking fund should be increased by the difference between the two rates. Is it not perfectly evident that by making such a recalculation the whole principal and interest would have been found to have been paid, and so far from there being an instalment due there would have been an over-payment? And this, forsooth, is to be by way of relief to a man who has already repaid more than the principal. I will read the words of the sub-section—

> "Such annual sum shall continue to be paid until such less number of payments thereof from the date at which it commenced as will pay off the purchase money on the assumption that the annual sum so charged included interest at the rate of £3 10s. per cent. per annum have been made, and no longer."

But if he has more than repaid on the new assumption, what nonsense it is to enact a provision of this kind! What I want to convince the right hon. Gentleman of is—and it is as clear as daylight—that his sub-section is nonsense, and that he is enacting an impossibility, because a man in the case I have mentioned would have already paid his principal, and it is ridiculous to say that the instalments should continue on a debt which has been already paid. When it is found that men have more than repaid there will be a claim for compensation. The real grievance will then arise, and an amending Bill will have to be introduced. Then the persons who bought for cash will say, "Are we to have no compensation?" and their case will be a strong one. It will be no answer to say that the cash buyers bought on the gross, whereas the annuitants bought on the net. That is not a fact. The cash buyers, the short annuitants, and the long annuitants all bought at twenty-two and a half years purchase of the net value, and therefore they all stand in the same position. Now observe the extraordinary position which will arise. A buys a tithe rent-charge and pays in cash twenty-two and a half years purchase; B buys a tithe rent-charge, but does not pay cash. He borrows the money from the Government at £3 16s. 3½d. per cent., and how, by the simple fact that B has borrowed money from the Government, can he have suffered any greater injustice than A, who paid cash? The argument is perfectly ridiculous. The difficulty we have to contend with is to get into the minds of hon. Members the grotesque monstrosity of this proposal. I am convinced that if hon. Members really understood these proposals the Bill would be defeated by three to one. But the fact is it is not understood. I maintain that unless this Amendment is accepted the sub-section will be nonsense, and that it will be found that it cannot be worked at all in some cases, and that it will work so unjustly in other cases that an amending Bill will be needed.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said the Treasury Bench was deserted by all the Government except the Attorney General for Ireland, who, however, knew far better than he did the utter absurdity of this Bill. It represented fraud and dishonesty, and the absolute ignorance of the gentleman who drafted it insulted the intelligence of Parliament. Anyone who read the second sub-section of Clause 1 would see clearly that a man who had been paying at the rate of £3 16s. 6d. since 1872 must have long since paid all the principal, and all the interest; and the absurdity of this clause was that he was to go on still paying. But the clause was something more than arrant absurdity; it was downright dishonesty, and amounted to the repudiation by the State itself of contracts. The Government had no right to misuse public property as they were doing under this clause. They were giving a large donation out of the public funds to various parties who were supposed to pay for their own interests. An honest man who got the payment of his just debt at the expense of the community ought to give this money to the Chancellor of the Exchequer as conscience money. The idea that Parliament was omnipotent was true, but there were moral grounds on which this bargain ought not to be made; it was a gross fraud. He asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he could point to any instance, since the Revolution, of Parliament repudiating debts and cancelling obligations. He knew of no case on the Statute Book where, when a tenant had entered, under the provisions of an Act of Parliament, into a solemn contract with the State to pay a certain sum of money at £3 16s. 6d. per cent., thirty years after the contract was made the interest should be reduced to £3 10s.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It has been done in the case of the Church glebe tenants.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said that that was the exception which proved the rule. When was the error discovered? When was the remarkable change in the personnel of the Treasury officials, which resulted in the discovery? It was an afterthought. It was never mooted for thirty years, and then, when there was no necessity, Parliament stepped in to relieve, not the poverty-stricken tenant, but Lord Ardilaun, at the expense of the Irish Church Fund. He supported most strongly the Amendment before the House, and he hoped it would be pressed to a division. When the clause came on for discussion he would denounce the policy of the clause, and show how the Irish Church Fund had been misappropriated for the benefit of the Irish landlords. The right hon. Gentleman had intimated that the Bill was to rectify a fin an ial fraud. That fraud had been undiscovered by Lord Ardilaun and other landlords, but it had been discovered by a Treasury official in the back parlours of the Treasury Office, and must be rectified. The right hon. Gentleman had decided to rectify this error. Would he go further and rectify the other error committed by the Treasury officials, by which the Irish people had been robbed of three and a half millions of money? That error would not be rectified, because it would have to be rectified at the expense of the British taxpayer; but the error which this Bill was to rectify would be rectified, because the cost would fall upon the Irish Church Fund. The sub-section was a mass of legal jargon, and, in his opinion, had the provisions of the Bill been perused by the House at large it would have been entirely repudiated.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) said that the Government had always acted on the basis of the sanctity of contract, and he now wished to know whether the principle of sanctity of contract was to be given up. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had alluded to the case of the Irish Church glebe tenants, in which it had been given up, but that was an entirely different case to the question of tithes. They were occupying tenants, and when relief was given to them it was obvious there was a special reason for giving it. Then, again, if the Government took the other case, no argument could be based upon it, because it was the Government's own doing. The Government stated in the House a few years previously that they could not reduce a contract that had been entered into with Parliament. That was stated over and over again in another place by Lord Salisbury, and yet it was this Government which started the principle of making the reduction and doing away with the contract as well. The reason for the special reduction in the case of the occupying landlord was a very different matter, because in that case the tenant comprised the positions of landlord and tenant. Those who took advantage of a number of years purchase under the Land Act were landlords as well as occupying tenants, and it was in the combined capacity that they received the concession, and the Government mitigated the contract. If this present reduction was not put upon the ground of exceptional circumstances, which was the only warrant at all for giving a reduction, by statute, to the tenant, effect would be given to a principle far-reaching in its consequences, which could not be confined to Ireland. That principle was that if parties agreed to pay a certain sum of money under a contract to the State, Parliament could come some time afterwards and make alterations in the terms, although in the interval some other person had come forward and paid the sum in cash.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Might I ask, on a point of order, whether this has any reference whatever to the Amendment before the Committee.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think the hon. Gentleman is somewhat trespassing beyond the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. CALDWELL said that his point was that by Act of Parliament £3 16s. 6d. per cent. was fixed as the amount to be paid by the parties, and it was now proposed to reduce that amount to £3 10s. If the right hon. Gentleman thought by such interruptions as he had made he would shorten the debate he might find that he was mistaken. He could find no precedent for such a reduction except in the case of the Irish Church Glebe tenants. There was no case on record, neither in Scotland nor in England, and the Committee was entitled to say that the Government could not violate a contract entered into under an Act of Parliament. Was the principle of sanctity of contract to be given up? Was this to apply to every case? If not, the Government should make out a case of the exceptional circumstances which justified it in this instance. They were dealing with parties in possession of land upon which there was a first charge. It had no relation whatever to the profits of the land or what is taken off it. The charge having been made a fixed one, was there any case where the owner could not plead poverty in which this principle could be applied? The Government did not propose to give any such relief to England or Scotland, and the Committee were entitled to ask whether the Government proposed to apply this principle to persons who could not make out a special case.

MR. T. M. HEALY said he had asked for an explanation for the action of the Government, but had failed to elicit a reply. On thinking the matter out he had arrived at a solution of the problem. He had come to the conclusion that Mr. Gladstone was the only statesman who could have repudiated the suggestion that the Government had made an error, and the Government had not thought it safe to bring in the Bill until Mr. Gladstone had died. He had just received a letter which illustrated the manner in which tenants were treated in Ireland in contrast to the landlords. The Local Government Act relieved the landlords of all rates in the Corofin division of Tipperary, and the Local Government Board had just struck a rate of 9s. 6d. in the pound. The people wondered what it was for, and were told that the reason was that for nine or ten years the debt had been accruing, and it now had to be paid off. The Local Government Board did not discover it until the landlords were relieved of the rates. The landlords were entitled to pay that debt for the last eight or nine years, and he wished now to ask the Government whether they would make any provision for the payment of the amount which ought to have been paid by the landlords in the seven or eight years past, and which is now put on the shoulders of the people of the Corofin division of Tipperary. They applied to the Local Government Board to extend the time of payment to two years, but the Local Government Board refused. If the Government were anxious to relieve one error in the case of the landlords, why were they not anxious to act in a similar manner for the relief of the tenant? He thought the attitude taken by the right hon. Gentleman on this Bill was simply deplorable. On other occasions he had been able to give reasons for his attitude, but on the present occasion he had failed to answer any argument which had been put to him.

MR. MURNAGHAN, who was very indistinctly heard, was understood to say that the right hon. Gentleman had given no solid reason which would satisfy the Committee for the reductions he proposed to make by this Bill. His one point was that a mistake had been made, and would have to be rectified. The Committee had no means of verifying that fact, and it was only right that further information should be given. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to give a certain reduction on delayed payments for purchase. The man who had raised the money to pay off his indebtedness in thirty years received benefit, but the man who arranged to pay in fifty-two years benefited to the extent of the reduction of seven yearly instalments. The Irish Members were not satisfied with the figures of the right hon. Gentleman, and they were within their rights in protesting against such procedure. The right hon. Gentleman could do in this matter what he had done with the first part of the clause—he could postpone it for further consideration. He did not dispute that the right hon. Gentleman was doing all he could to act in a perfectly fair manner, but in the interest of one class——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Gentleman is wandering from the Amendment.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: On a point of order, is not my hon. friend entitled to show, when largess is given to a certain class, how that largess might be better expended?

*THE CHAIRMAN: No doubt the hon. Gentleman is a better judge than myself of these matters, but in my opinion the hon. Gentleman who was addressing the Committee was irrelevant.

Mr. T. M. Healy.

MR. MURNAGHAN said he objected to the right hon. Gentleman putting his hand into the pockets of the Irish people and taking money out of the Church Fund not for a public purpose. The Irish Members were entitled to have some reply from the right hon. Gentleman to the arguments which had been urged on behalf of those whom they represented. If no reply was given, they could only test the matter by a division.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL said the Amendment was one under which certain reductions were to be made. He begged to remind the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary that he was not the financial authority on Irish questions. He complained that, although this was a financial question, neither the Chancellor of the Exchequer nor the Secretary to the Treasury were present to consider it. And their absence showed that they were neglecting their duties. [Laughter.] It was no laughing matter, except to those hon. Members opposite who were going to gain from it. It was a most unheard of procedure when a finance measure of this kind was under discussion, that some one was not present to defend the financial policy put forward by the Amendment. Since the Amendment had been moved, the words "financial fraud" and "Treasury fraud" had been freely used. Yet nobody was present to speak for the Treasury or for the Solomon in the Treasury who had discovered the error. It was not the place of the right hon. Gentleman to do so, he had done his duty when he had moved the clause. Under the circumstances, he begged leave to move to report Progress.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Chairman do report Progress; and ask leave to sit again."—(Mr. MacNeill.) But the Chairman, being of opinion that the motion was an abuse of the Rules of the House, declined to propose the Question thereon to the Committee.

MR. MCKENNA (Monmouthshire, N.): I should be very glad to have some explanation why this particular sum of £3 10s. per cent. is taken as the annual charge for interest. There must be some particular reason why that sum is taken.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The general principle of this Bill was discussed very fully on the Second Reading, it was discussed again on the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for East Mayo, and again on this Amendment. We have had notice of another Amendment by the hon. Member for East Mayo. That has been my reason for not going fully into this matter.

MR. DILLON: I must say that it is an extraordinary position for the Chief Secretary to take up. I submit that the clause, as it stands, is nonsense and cannot be worked. In some cases it would cause gross injustice, and in other cases it would be absolutely unworkable.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is quite wrong. I may further say that the Amendment to reduce the rate of interest is certainly open to objection.

MR. DILLON: I submit that my case is made out by the admission of the Chief Secretary himself—absolutely and without any question or doubt. The whole purpose of the Bill is to benefit the landlords. There is no other justification of the Bill. They say now that a man who has arranged—and this I am sure would be the case in a great many instances—to repay his loan for the purchase of his tithes, by instalments terminating in thirty-five years under the operation of this sub-section, if this new arrangement is accepted, will get four or five annual instalments knocked off, and another man who has arranged to pay the tithe loan in thirty-one instalments will get the next year's instalment knocked off, although under this new term of interest he may have repaid considerably more than the whole of his loan. Are we to be told seriously that men under these circumstances will sit down content, and that you will not be face to face with the clamour—I must say the justifiable clamour—of those treated in this fashion? Nothing at all is to be paid to the man who has put his hand in his own pocket. I maintain that my contention has not been answered, nor even attempted to be answered, by the representatives of the Government, and that the clause as it stands without my Amendment is nonsense. It will be unworkable in some cases, and in other cases it will work gross injustice.

Question put.

Captain Donelan and Mr.
Patrick O'Brien.

Question proposed, "That Clause 1 stand part of the Bill."

MR. DILLON: We now come to the serious question that Clause 1 stand part of the Bill. I shall endeavour to bring clearly before the minds of hon. Members what they are called upon to do by passing this clause. There are two main headings under which the considerations affecting this clause naturally fall. The first of these headings is the question whether there is really any grievance on the part of Irish landlords, and whether, under the arrangements which this clause proposes to break up, the Irish landlords were generously treated, and entered into a voluntary bargain, without any kind of compulsion. The second heading is what will be the financial effect on the Church Fund if this clause is passed into law. First of all I turn to the question of the grievance under which the Irish landlords are alleged to suffer, and to meet which this extraordinary proposal is submitted to the House. That grievance is, as I said in the earlier stages of this debate, based on the extraordinary claim that Mr. Gladstone while he was passing the Church Act through this House made a miscalculation, that the whole House condoned that miscalculation, and that the spokesmen of the Irish landlords in that day in the long debates which took place on the Church Act, and particularly Clause 32, never discovered that they were the victims of a Treasury miscalculation, and that they swallowed this settlement, as I shall prove they swallowed it, with every appearance of satisfaction, and in absolute ignorance of the fact that they were being made to pay seven years instalments more than were just. The Attorney General based his case entirely on the famous speech made by Mr. Gladstone when proposing the First Reading of the Church Act. I regret to say that I shall be obliged to quote at some little length from that speech, because it has been the basis of the whole of this discussion. He came to that portion of his Bill which dealt with the disposition of the tithe rent-charge, and he announced that it was his intention to offer the tithe rent-charge to the landlords of Ireland at twenty-two and a half years purchase. Mr. Gladstone said*—

"That is, of course, twenty-two and a-half years purchase, not of the old gross £100, but of the £75 a year. We make that offer because we think there may be landlords in Ireland who will be disposed at once to wind up the arrangement with us. But, if Gentlemen will listen to me, they will see that we have another alternative for those who may not be disposed to purchase the tithe rent-charge out and out in money down at 22½ years purchase. It is this: we make them a compulsory sale."

I would ask hon. Members to bear this in mind. This was the alternative proposed in the Church Bill. Mr. Gladstone continued—

"I have not the least idea anyone will object to that. We convey the tithe rent-charge to them under the following conditions. We charge them in our book with £2,250 for every net £100 a year tithe rent-charge; that is to say we sell them a tithe rent-charge at a rate to yield them 4½ per cent. We then credit them on the other side with a loan of equal amount. We provide that they shall pay off that loan by annual instalments with interest. The rate of interest to be charged on the instalment is 3½ per cent. The consequence is that a fund of 1 per cent. will remain as a sinking fund to absorb the principal. The purchaser of the tithe rent-charge in that form, except that he will get rid of the fluctuation—for we must give him a fixed amount—will not be called upon to make any addition whatever to his annual payment. He will be liable for the annual payment for a term of forty-five years, and at the close of the term he will under this arrangement have the rent-charge, whatever it may be for the residue of the time, for nothing. That will be the financial effect of the arrangement, which, I think, will not be bad for the Irish landlord."

It is on that speech of Mr. Gladstone's that the whole case of the Government rests. That was a speech made while introducing the Church Bill in its original form, when it was proposed to sell the tithe rent-charge to the landlords either for cash at twenty-two and a half years purchase, or for twenty-two and a half years purchase of the land to the tithe-payer, the amount of the purchase money to be paid by forty-five annual instalments at the rate of £4 10s. per annum on the purchase money. What happened? When the Church Bill was introduced in Committee the famous Clause 32 of the Bill was altered and appeared in a different shape—in the shape in which it now stands. That is an important point to remember. It was then proposed to sell the tithe rent-charge at the same number of years purchase—twenty-two and a half years—but the landlords were allowed to deduct from the tithe rent-charge under the new arrangement what they had paid on the average of the last five years for poor rate, which, under the Poor Rate Act of 1838, they had the power to deduct from the tithe rent-charge. Therefore the actual amount was reduced by a considerable poundage. I daresay it averaged half-a-crown in the pound, and the annual instalment was reduced from £4 10s. per cent. to £4 9s., and the instalments were extended to fifty-two years instead of forty-five years. That was in the second form of Clause 32 as introduced in the Committee on the Church Act. I desire to emphasise what Mr. Gladstone said as to the amount of the interest on which the money to purchase the tithes was to be lent. That had disappeared out of the calculation altogether, and it was proposed that the tithe should be extinguished in the case of those not ready to pay by fifty-two annual instalments calculated at £4 9s. per cent. on the amount of twenty-two and a half years purchase of the net tithe rent-charge as distinguished from the gross, being the tithe rent-charge less the amount for poor rate. This second proposal was substituted for the previous proposal, and in the course of the long debate on Clause 32 no complaint was made on behalf of the Irish landlords as to the change proposed. I am indignant to find the landlords—who allege that there was a miscalculation and misunderstanding, which is absolutely without foundation—going back on the speech of Mr. Gladstone introducing the Bill originally, and utterly ignoring the debate on Clause 32 in the amended form, that clause being in substitution of the proposal in the Bill as it originally stood. What we have to deal with is the proposal in Clause 32 as it appeared before the Committee on the Church Bill. The first observation I have to make in regard to the proposal in Clause 32 is this. Suppose that there had been a miscalculation, or suppose that the terms of Clause 32 as finally debated in the House were less favourable to the Irish landlords than the original terms proposed in the first draft of the Irish Church Bill, am I to be told for a single moment that the landlords in this House would not have made a strong demand upon the Government to give them better terms? But in the whole course of the discussion no such contention was put forward, as far as I can find out, on behalf of the Irish landlords. On the contrary, as I shall show beyond all question, the proposal of the Government was accepted by all parties—Liberals, Radicals, and landlords—as a gift to the Irish landlords in order to mitigate their opposition to the Bill. That proposal, which was dealt with in the discussions as a gift to the landlords, was not the original proposal to which Mr. Gladstone's speech referrred in introducing the Bill. I have already alluded to some of the language which was used in the course of the debate on Clause 32. Here is what Mr. Gladstone himself said, "It was that consideration of policy which led the Government." What I want to direct the attention of the Committee to is that Mr. Gladstone's speech in defending the fifty-two years was a speech of apology against the attacks of Mr. Disraeli and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. The present Chancellor of the Exchequer said, in answer to Mr. Gladstone's defence of the 3½ per cent.——

* See The Parliamentary Debates [Third Series], Vol. cxciv., p. 448.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: What authority has the hon. Gentleman for saying the interest was 3½ per cent.?

MR. DILLON: What authority have I? Does the right hon. Gentleman deny that it is so? Does he mean to tell me that when Mr. Gladstone introduced a proposal to extinguish this sum of money by fifty-two annual payments of £4 9s. per cent. he did not know that it involved an interest of £31 6s. 3d.? You may say that Mr. Gladstone's politics were false and that his principles of finance were faulty, but this is the first time I have ever heard it suggested that he could not work out such a simple sum as that. Such a supposition is grotesque in the extreme. But mark what it involves. It means that not only were Mr. Gladstone and the Treasury deceived, but every Member of the House of Commons was deceived. Dealing with this proposal, the present Chancellor of the Exchequer said*—

"He yielded to no one in the force of his objections to many of the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion, and he could not witness with entire approval the payments to Maynooth. But he would rather see the whole of this tithe rent-charge devoted to the purposes of the Roman Catholic religion, than see it taken from the Church and appropriated to purely secular objects. In his opinion the proposal of the Government combined sacrilege with bribery. These were strong words, but nothing less strong would express his feelings. He believed it was sacrilege because it was taking away from the Church property to which the State had no right, and devoting it to secular purposes and bribery; also because it was admitted to secure the consent of the landlords by handing over to them the property upon terms making the transfer a gift and not a sale."

Then we come to Sir Frederick Heygate, the Member for Derry, one of the leading members of the landlord party—

"He quite agreed with his hon. friend Sir Michael Hicks Beach that the clause was nothing less than bribery and sacrilege. The Irish landlords were, in fact, asked to take a bribe and assist the Government to pass the Bill."

Then comes Colonel Barttelot, who also denounced the proposal; and I must read an extract from the speech of one who was as great an authority on finance as anybody in his day—the late Mr. Fawcett. He said—

"He was astonished when he heard the proposition made; he had consulted distinguished Members of the House about it, and they said: 'We know it is making an enormous present to Irish landlords, but we must do something to grease the wheels, to conciliate hostility and buy off opposition.'"

The reason I have referred to and quoted these speeches again is to make it perfectly clear that all these statements made in the course of the debate on Clause 32 had reference to the proposal which is now in force and is the law of the land, and that they had no reference to any proposal of 3½ per cent. for forty-five annual instalments. In his opening remarks the present Chancellor of the Exchequer put this point remarkably clearly—

"The second part of the clause, the omission of which was moved, consisted of a financial process under which the landlords would, for 52 years, continue to pay to the State the exact sum which they had hitherto paid to the Church; and at the end of that time would in reality obtain the tithe rent-charge as a gift."

There was no doubt about it in the minds of the House, and in the face of these statements it is perfectly monstrous to talk about a miscalculation. Notwithstanding the appeals of Mr. Gladstone, which were not on logical grounds or grounds of finance, but on grounds of policy and expediency, Mr. Fawcett and other leading Radicals divided against the clause on the ground that it was too favourable to the landlords and that it gave away public funds to private individuals. What was the result? In that division every single Irish landlord in this House voted in favour of the clause. I repeat that in the whole history of that Act there is not the slightest shred of justification for the contention that there was any miscalculation or possibility of misunderstanding. What happened afterwards? Clause 32 made to the Irish landlords an offer which they eagerly accepted. There was no compulsion; they were absolutely free to accept the terms or to remain as they were. It is said that under the Act of 1872 the right to vary which was still retained by those who did not redeem was annulled. My answer to that is that that clause of the Act of 1872 passed through both Houses without a single word of protest or objection from any Irish landlord, and, seeing that in those days the representation of Ireland both in the House of Lords and in the House of Commons was almost entirely in the hands of the Irish landlords, it is an absurdity to argue that they were not a party to that enactment when they allowed it to pass through without protest. They were parties to it because the right of varying tithes in Ireland was practically a nullity. That right had been so fenced round with difficulties that, during the thirty years which had intervened since the settlement, out of 2,400 parishes the tithes had been varied in only sixty. One reason the landlords permitted the Act of 1872 to pass was that it was thought the variation might do them more harm than good, but the main reason was that it was a matter of indifference, because it was a right they never exercised. When the Government contend that the landlords of Ireland, in accepting the Act of 1872 as part and parcel of the settlement under the Church Act, were not making a bargain, they are speaking against the facts of the case. No clearer case of Parliamentary bargaining was ever put on record in this House. But the question of variability as affected by the Act of 1872 has no bearing on the present proposal. This clause does not deal with the variable tithe rent charge, but with the invariable terminable annuities, and those invariable terminable annuities were set up by the landlords availing themselves of the terms of Clause 32, which were admitted by everybody to be in the nature of a gift and a bribe to the landlords. I turn now to the effect of this proposal on the Church Fund. First of all I will direct attention to a very remarkable debate which took place in this House in 1894. The Church Fund is a very extraordinary fund; it reminds one of the widow's cruse—it has frequently been said to be exhausted, and still millions can be drawn from it. In 1894 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Montrose brought in a Bill to reinstate the evicted Irish tenants, and in connection with that Bill it was proposed to lay a charge of £100,000 on the Irish Church Fund for the purpose of facilitating that operation. On the first reading of the Bill the First Lord of the Treasury got up immediately after the right hon. Gentleman proposed the Bill, and made a very impassioned speech, in the course of which he used the following language*—

"Following the order of the right hon. Gentleman's explanation, I now come to the amount to be taken from the Irish Church surplus in order to meet the necessities of the Bill. I have no observations to make on that point. First, when I was in office, and had official means of information on those points, I was assured that the Irish Church surplus was mortgaged up to the hilt. The number of charges upon it were such that, after we had taken the £1,500,000 required for the Congested Board, practically nothing would be left behind. Whether since that time any circumstances have come to the knowledge of the Treasury, the right hon. Gentleman will inform me at a later stage of the Bill; but my official advisers at that time informed me that nothing beyond the £1,500,000 was available for any public purpose; and if we are to charge that fund with £100,000, or with a larger sum, and the fund proves to be insufficient to meet the liability, it will be impossible for the British taxpayer to flatter himself that he will get off without having to make up the deficiency."

The soul of the First Lord of the Treasury was wrung with anxiety, fearing the contingent liability on the British taxpayer. Since then we have had a Bill setting up in Ireland a Department of Agriculture, by which the Church Fund is charged with £70,000 a year, which, I make out, is the interest on about £2,700,000. We are now invited to hand over from this fund to the landlords £1,200,000 in cash, and furthermore to reduce the income of the fund by about £30,000 a year, or to hand over to the landlords over £2,000,000 more. That is to say, that more than £4,000,000 are to be charged upon this fund, which, according to the First Lord of the Treasury, could not bear an additional charge of £100,000 in 1894. The next point is the Treasury Memorandum of 1895, which was drawn up in connection with the proposal to reduce the selling price of tithe rent-charge in the case of sales under the Land Purchase Acts. This Memorandum at great length pointed out as one of the main grounds for refusing to give the Treasury consent to this proposal of the Land Commission that the Irish Church Fund would be made bankrupt by such consent. The Treasury Memorandum states that the calculation of the Land Commission was that such consent would involve a loss of over £800,000 to the Church Fund. The proposal of the Land Commission was that, whereas in all sales up to that date they were obliged to redeem tithe rent-charge at twenty-two and a half years purchase, they should in future be allowed to redeem it at twenty years purchase, and also be allowed to redeem the perpetual annuities on a basis of forty-five years payments instead of fifty-two. It was argued by the Treasury that such a proposal would involve a loss of over £800,000, and that the Church Fund could not bear such a loss. But then, within six months, overriding its own decision and argument, the Treasury granted its consent, so that in addition to the sums I have mentioned, there is this possible loss of £800,000. Where are we as regards the solvency of the Church Fund? When the Government were pressed on this matter last year they prepared a fresh Memorandum to show that the Church Fund was solvent, and a most extraordinary document it is. In the first place, the Memorandum declares that they abandon all attempt to estimate the assets or liabilities of the fund, and then it goes on to say that the estimate which is given of the receipts and liabilities of the fund for the next forty-five years is made up on the supposition that no more sales occur in the Land Courts. I contend that that is turning our whole discussion into a perfect farce. All Ireland are in favour of expediting sales in the Land Courts; they are going on now at the rate of £2,000,000 or £3,000,000 worth of property per annum, and there is growing up in Ireland a strong agitation for some means of greatly facilitating this process of sale, and yet we are invited to discuss this whole subject and consider the capacity of the Church Fund to stand this charge on the supposition that the sales in the Land Courts stop, and that no further sales are effected. A more grotesque and extraordinary theory was never placed before Parliament. Having made that impossible assumption, they proceed to make an estimate of the condition of the fund during the next forty years. What does it come to? They attempt to show that, even supposing the present Bill passes into law, the fund will remain solvent until the year 1946-47 with a very small surplus, and that after that date it will probably be necessary to seriously diminish the provision made for the Agricultural Department. This gift to the landlords will seriously diminish the Irish Church Fund, and will affect the grant to the Agricultural Department. This is an extraordinary instance of the recklessness of the Government, for having started a department to which they attach enormous importance for instructing Irishmen in the art of agriculture, and having given us the hope that if it is successful a further sum will be granted, the Government now come forward with a proposal to take a further sum from that very fund from which the agricultural grant is drawn. Does the right hon. Gentleman anticipate that the Purchase Acts will cease to operate? In the Bill of 1896 a great concession was made to the Irish landlords. Under Clause 37 of that Act the Land Commission had the power to order the redemption of the tithe rent-charge in case of sale to the tenant at twenty years purchase and to order the redemption on the basis of forty-five years instalments. That involved a loss of £850,000; but still it was an inducement to sell. Under that concession a landlord had a bonus for selling an estate to his tenant. If he sold his estate he could redeem the tithe rent-charge at twenty years purchase, but if he did not sell he could only redeem the tithe rent-charge at twenty-two and a half years purchase. If the landlord sold his estate he could redeem at forty-five years instalments, and if he did not sell the period would be fifty-two years. I admit it was an inroad on public funds for the benefit of the landlords, but it had this advantage, that it was a bribe to facilitate sale. The Government now propose to block and obstruct this process of sale, because they withdraw by this clause from the landlords the inducement to sell which existed under the Act of 1896. So far as this clause has any effect it will have a tendency to withdraw from the Irish landlords that inducement to sell their estates which existed before. Therefore the Government have no ground or argument in support of the present proposal in what was done in 1896. This clause is simply a shameless attempt to take a large portion of the public funds in order to hand it over to the landlords of Ireland. Before finally moving the rejection of this clause, I want to appeal to the Government, if they do consider it necessary to hand over this money, to at least take it from the profits which the Treasury has made by lending money at 3½ per cent. to the Irish Church Fund. The Treasury must have made a profit of something like £1,000,000 by this process. If they adopted this course they would not be depriving the Irish people of money which could be devoted to much more useful purposes.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said the hon. Member had admitted that the question was a very complicated one, but he had evidently failed to understand it. The case of the Government was strengthened by the fact that while the hon. Member for East Mayo had referred at length to the provisions of the Irish Church Act of 1869 he had scarcely mentioned the Act of 1872 at all. The hon. Member had left out of account altogether the fact that landlords were entitled to deduct the poor rate before paying the tithe, and in his estimate of the capital value of the tithe he had based his calculation upon the gross tithe rent-charge and not upon the net value. Therefore the value would be rather more than £800,000 less than the amount stated. In regard to the Act of 1869, in the first place Mr. Gladstone proposed that the sale should be compulsory, but, for some reason, during the interval between his introductory speech and the printing of the Bill, Mr. Gladstone changed his mind, and the compulsory proposal was dropped. It was then pointed out to Mr. Gladstone that he had neglected to take into consideration this question of the reduction of the poor-rate, and in Committee he corrected this mistake by moving without comment an Amendment. The hon. Member stated that in doing so Mr. Gladstone was increasing the rate of interest from £3 10s. to £3 16s. per cent., but he asked what authority had the hon. Member for making that statement? He could not point to any statement made by Mr. Gladstone to that effect. He merely said that he was bound to assume it because Mr. Gladstone was a great financier, and knew what he was doing. He (Mr. Balfour) was ready to admit Mr. Gladstone's merits as a financier, but he was bound to say that the hon. Member was wrong in asserting that Mr. Gladstone, while making the reduction for the poor-rate, at the same time increased the interest from £3 10s. to £3 16s., for that was not Mr. Gladstone's idea in making those further proposals. As Mr. Gladstone stated in introducing the Bill, the clause contained two proposals, one providing for a cash payment and the other for an annuity extending over fifty-two years. But it was also provided that there should be a reduction of such sum based upon an average of five years, which the purchaser should be entitled to deduct from the tithe rent-charge in regard to the poor rate. What Mr. Gladstone really did was to allow a reduction of the amount of poor rate in respect of this payment, but what he gave with one hand in that way he took away with the other, for he increased the period from forty-five to fifty-two years. The point was that the admission of this seven years exactly made the difference between the payment by the landlords of the net and the gross tithe rent-charge. What Mr. Gladstone intended to do was to allow the tithe rent-charge payer to pay a sum less the amount of the poor rate, but at the same time, in order to preserve the gross amount of the Church Fund, he deliberately increased the period from forty-five to fifty-two years. So far it could not be contended that the tithe rent payer had any grievance, because under the Act of 1869 the tithe rent-charge payer could redeem not by an annuity but by a cash payment, and he was called upon to redeem not the net but the gross tithe rent-charge. Therefore the tithe rent-charge payer who redeemed in cash was placed by the provision of the Act of 1869 in precisely the same position as the tithe rent-charge payer who redeemed by an annuity. It was not until 1872 that the real disparity commenced. In the Bill of 1872 a condition was introduced to the effect that the tithe rent-charge payer who had redeemed in cash was entitled to deduct the poor rate. That Bill passed through the House practically without discussion, and Mr. Gladstone never explained his proposal upon this point. The hon. Member for East Mayo dwelt at enormous length upon the provisions of the Act of 1869, but he said practically nothing about the Act of 1872. Therefore, he entirely ignored the real essence of the case. How could it be defended that the tithe rent-charge payer who paid in cash was entitled to pay a smaller sum, while the annuitant was called upon to pay a larger sum?

MR. DILLON: That is not the case, and I absolutely deny it.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said he still asserted that that was absolutely the case. The hon. Member had practically ignored the Act of 1872. As to the hon. Member's remarks upon the effect this proposal would have upon the Irish Church Fund, it was not his business to defend that fund. What he did say, however, was that he had had these calculations in the Treasury Memorandum checked again and again in every possible way, and he believed the figures in that Memorandum might be taken as being as nearly accurate as circumstances would allow. The hon. Member for East Mayo made a great point of the fact that the loss upon land purchase transactions was not taken into account, but he should have read a little more from the latter part of the Memorandum, which says—

"It remains to consider the effect of redemptions in cases of sale under the Land Purchase Acts £100 per annum of tithe rent-charge is sold under those Acts for £2,000, which sum could not be applied so as to reduce the net annual charge on the Fund by more than £60. So there would be a loss of £40 per annum for every £100 per annum of tithe rent-charge redeemed. In the case of tithe annuities, perpetuity rents, mortgages, and land annuities, the loss would be proportionately less, and the loss on tithe and land annuities must diminish as they draw nearer to their close. If such redemptions continued on a considerable scale, it would ultimately become necessary to reduce the provision of £70,000 per annum under the Agricultural Bill; not, however, in the near future."

When speaking on the Second Reading of this Bill, he stated that he believed that if the land purchase transactions went on in future at about the same pace as they had lately done, the effect on the Church Fund would be that it would still be able to afford this charge for fifteen years, and probably for thirty years, and that after thirty years they might be able to still pay £70,000 a year to the Department of Agriculture. He quite agreed with what the hon. Member had said in regard to the desirability of preserving the Church Fund, but he did not think it was incumbent upon the House to dwell too carefully upon what might happen a generation hence. He ventured to say that if the Department of Agriculture proved a success the final result would be not that these amounts would be diminished, but that they would be increased. But the fact that they might be unable to pay this large sum to the Department of Agriculture was not, in his judgment, a sufficient reason why they should refuse to do justice to those whose payments constituted the Church Fund.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): As I understand the case it is simply this. Originally the persons liable for tithe rent-charge in Ireland had the option of adopting two methods. I understand that some tithe payers continue to pay the full tithe now. The others, I believe, have the option of electing to adopt either one of two systems. The Act of 1872 dealt in two different ways with two different classes of creditors, but it does not necessarily follow that there was any injustice to either of them, and in this respect I think the right hon Gentleman has conspicuously failed to make out his case. Who knows—he evidently does not—what the mind of Parliament was in 1872 in creating what he calls this disparity? The right hon. Gentleman was not in the House when the Act was passed; I was not in the House, and many hon. Members now present were not Members of the House at that time. Those who were then Members of the House appear to be under an obligation to inform us what was the Parliamentary understanding then arrived at. The Chancellor of the Exchequer in particular, whose views have been cited during this debate in a sense entirely favourable to the contention of hon. Members from Ireland, has not favoured us with an explanation, and until he does so, I must take it that the contention of the hon. Members from Ireland must be true. I have listened very carefully to the speech of the Member for East Mayo, but I felt all the time that he was merely beating the air. This Bill is no new thing in this House. It is part of the policy to which an enormous majority of this House of Commons during its whole career has devoted itself. I will not go into a retrospect of the various Acts which have been based, in my opinion, on the principle on which this Act was based. The first was an Act which took public money and gave it in relief of rates. Then there was a similar Act by which public money was granted in aid of Voluntary schools; that was public money given to a particular class. Then there was a section in the Finance Act two or three years ago, by which the Chancellor of the Exchequer put money into the pockets of a particular class. Then came the enormous bribe which was given to the Irish landlords in order to grease the wheels of the Local Government Act, and then, last year, we had the Act by which tithe rent-charge benefices were to be paid out of public funds. Every one of these Acts was based on the principle of this Bill. There is one difference, and only one, between the five measures to which I have referred and the present proposal. In Her Majesty's Speech from the Throne we were told that this Bill was going to be introduced, but we were also told that no domestic reforms which involved a large expenditure of money could be undertaken. I suppose this may be called a domestic reform, and I am told it involves an expenditure of 2½ millions. But what is the difference between it and the measures to which I have referred? They were paid for out of the Imperial Exchequer, whereas this is going to be paid for out of the miserable remnant of the Irish Church Fund. I object altogether to the proposals contained in this Bill, but speaking here as a Scotch Member, I declare I would rather see this relief a charge upon Imperial resources than on the small remnant of the Irish Church Fund which was to be devoted to purely Irish purposes. If this is a good thing, let us do it out of our own pockets, and let us not rob Ireland, for the sake of a small class, of money intended for the Irish people. I shall vote with my hon. friend against this clause.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): The last time I had the honour of addressing the House on the Irish question I condoled with the right hon and gallant Gentleman opposite on what I ventured to call the somewhat pathetic position he occupied in this House—always lamenting the condition of the class to which he belonged. I reverse that statement to-night, and I congratulate the right hon. and gallant Gentleman on one of the most remarkable Parliamentary achievements that any man has ever been able to carry out in this House. He and his friends have succeeded in getting the Government to reverse the whole process of legislation, and to give to a particular class in Ireland monetary compensation previously refused in nearly every single case. Take some of the cases we have seen in this House. An unfortunate man is wrongly convicted; he is sent for years to imprisonment, he is deprived of the means of earning his livelihood, and his wife and children are deprived of his assistance as the breadwinner. Take the case of the two Irishmen whose release was procured by the confession of Peace the murderer. They were imprisoned for four or five years for a murder, and their relatives were deprived of their assistance as breadwinners.

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.): These two men had no relatives.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Oh, yes, they had; they were not married, but Irishmen always have relatives. A demand for compensation for these men was made, but ignominiously rejected by the Treasury. Officers in the Army and in the Navy who by admitted miscalculations, not conjectural miscalculations, have been treated unfairly, have come to Parliament session after session and have demanded compensation, which has always been refused. And now, for the first time in the history of Parliament, the right hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite, representing the landlords of Ireland, basing his claim on an alleged and conjectural miscalculation thirty years ago, is able to get from the Government for his class a redemption of seven years. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman is much to be congratulated on such a remarkable achievement. The Chief Secretary introduced this extraordinary Bill, but I think the Bill is not half so extraordinary as the arguments he used to support it. Take the speech we listened to a short time ago—a speech which I venture to say is the most interesting psychological as well as Parliamentary study I have ever had the pleasure of hearing in this House. The right hon. Gentleman lays down the principle that we are to judge of the intentions of Parliament, not by the words of Acts of Parliament, but by the ideas which he projects into the minds of gentlemen responsible for them thirty years ago. Why, Sir, if the right hon. Gentleman were to come before any of the Courts of this country, and were to quote, by way of arriving at the interpretation of an Act of Parliament, speeches in debate in this House, any Judge in the land would stop him and say, "What we have to consider are not the speeches by which the Bill became an Act of Parliament; our business is to interpret the words of the Statute before us. What was said during the discussion on the Bill has nothing to do with us." Then the right hon. Gentleman says that the Act of Parliament says so and so and means something else, and we ask him what are his reasons. He admits that the Act of Parliament prescribes a certain number of years for the repayment of a certain debt, but then he goes on to say that when the Act said fifty-two it meant forty-five. What is his proof? We read the speeches made for and against the Bill, and we read the speeches of Mr. Gladstone and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. According to the right hon. Gentleman Clause 32 of the Irish Church Act was a fraud on the landlords, but according to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was in Parliament when the Bill was being discussed, it was no fraud on the landlords at all, but a fraud on the Church, because it was a gift or a bribe to the landlords. In face of that the right hon. Gentleman now says, "Oh, really, I think I cannot give any reasons for that, except my own inner consciousness and my power of reading into the minds of people thirty years back. I think Mr. Gladstone must have meant not what he said but the opposite, and the Act of Parliament not what it said but the opposite; and what the Chancellor of the Exchequer meant when he described certain proposals as a gift or bribe to the landlords was not what he really meant, but that it was a fraud on the landlords." Then he says that my hon. friend the Member for East Mayo—whose mastery of this question, as well as the energy and persistence with which he is most properly fighting this iniquitous measure, entitle him to the admiration of the House—only paid attention to one Act and said nothing about the Act of 1872. The right hon. Gentleman says that Mr. Gladstone could not have had present to his mind all the facts of the case, and could not have gone into all the details. Mr. Gladstone made a certain proposal on the gross amount of the tithe-rent; he found that it was not charged on the gross but on the net, and he then very probably did justice to the landlords by calculating on the net instead of on the gross, but when he did that he very naturally and properly increased the number of instalments from forty-five to fifty-two. The right hon. Gentleman says he took away with one hand what he gave with the other, but it is perfectly evident that, having made a calculation which was unjust to the landlords, Mr. Gladstone did justice in a second calculation, and having done justice in that way he was bound also to do justice to the Treasury by increasing the instalments. That is what the right hon. Gentleman means by saying that Mr. Gladstone took away with one hand what he gave with the other. Then the right hon. Gentleman says, "Oh, but look at the Act of 1872. See what injustice existed until that Act was passed." That injustice affected only persons who had paid cash, because they were charged on the gross, whereas persons who have bought by instalments were charged on the net. The right hon. Gentleman says that this was an injustice, and so it was, and accordingly in 1872 the cash purchasers were put in the same position as those who redeemed by instalments. That injustice was removed, but is there any reason now why you should create a new injustice? I am absolutely unable to see how the right hon. Gentleman can use the Act of 1872 as any justification whatever for the proposals in this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the Irish Church Fund. I will not go into the question at length, but I must say that it is a very startling thing that, in face of the admitted needs of Ireland, we have this Government making a present to the Irish landlords of a large amount of money, not one penny of which, I believe, they are entitled to. If any such proposal had been made seven or eight years ago, I believe the House of Commons then in existence would have stood aghast and amazed at it. In fact, I believe that the right hon. and gallant Gentleman in his heart of hearts is really in a state of almost bewildered and benumbed surprise at finding any Government so reckless as to make such a proposal. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman and his friends have again and again complained in this House of the manner in which their property, or what they are pleased to call their property, has been transferred to the Irish tenants. I say "what they are pleased to call their property" because they make no allowance for the fact that the value of the land has been increased by the labour of the tenants. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman says that when Englishmen desire to do justice to the oppressed people in Ireland, what they mean is that they are going to take money out of the pockets of one class of Irishmen in order to give it to another class. I think there is a good deal in that contention. Let us apply that point of view to the present Bill. The Government say that the unfortunate Irish landlords have been suffering a gross injustice for thirty years owing to a miscalculation—a simple matter of arithmetic—which was made by the greatest financier of our time, and the Government in a noble spirit of righteousness propose to right this wrong. How do they propose to do it? Not by taking money from English pockets, but by taking money out of the Irish Church Fund, which was intended by Mr. Gladstone for the relief of Irish distress, and then they talk of the noble spirit of righteousness in which they have righted the wrongs of the Irish landlords. I think it is shameless on the part of the Government—in face of the many calls there are for relief in Ireland—in face of the festering sore of the evicted tenants for whom session after session we have asked assistance—to come forward with this proposal.

MR. FLYNN: I have had some years experience in this House, but I have never heard so many inconsequential, perplexed and confused arguments used as have been employed in connection with this Bill. I should have thought that, if the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary were justified in the statements he made in defence of this proposal, either the Chancellor of the Exchequer or the Secretary of the Treasury would have defended the acts of the Treasury. The right hon. Gentleman says that the Act of 1869, amended by the Act of 1872, means something different from what it states, but he has brought absolutely no proof either from the speeches on the Bill of 1869 or from the speeches on the Bill of 1872 which can overthrow one single figure or fact advanced by my hon. friend the Member for East Mayo. What does the whole foundation of this clause rest on? That the Treasury has been making a serious mistake all these years. In the Treasury Minute of 1895 it was stated that no case existed to support the charge of wrong-doing towards the Irish landlords, but by some strange concatenation of circumstances, some fortuitous concurrence of political accidents, we now find the Government advocating the existence of an injustice which they themselves previously denied. This is a matter of the most serious importance, and I think we are entitled to have some declaration from the Treasury before we proceed further. I think also we are entitled to know how the Irish Church Fund will stand if this Bill becomes law. The Chief Secretary does not know, and we do not know whether the Agricultural Department will receive the £70,000 a year allotted to it.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

TAUNTON CORPORATION BILL.

As amended, considered.

MR. STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): I desire to move a new clause, the object of which is to give a right of appeal to any person aggrieved. I may say that the clause which appears on the Paper is taken verbatim from the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, except as far as it is necessary to alter it in regard to the different procedure and jurisdiction in Scotland and England. It will be noticed that while the clause gives the right of appeal to any person aggrieved by an order made by the corporation, yet, pending the decision of that appeal, it is provided that the order shall remain in force. I think I have guarded in every possible way, therefore, against any injustice to the corporation in this matter. I am asking the House to remedy a decided injustice, because under this Bill power is given to the corporation to act as judge, jury, and prosecutor, without any right of appeal, except under Clause 90, to the court of quarter sessions. But it might happen that the quarter sessions had just sat, and frequently it would be three months before the appeal could be heard. I cannot see why this clause should be so much opposed, considering that it really carries out the views of the County Councils Association, and I therefore venture to appeal for the help of all those gentlemen who are interested in county councils and know their worth. The question has been discussed before, and I do not think it necessary to labour the point any further. All I ask is that before a man is judged by the corporation and finally condemned, he should have a right of appeal to an independent body. I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 18, after line 25, to insert the words, 'It shall be open to any local authority, dairyman, or person aggrieved by any such order or withdrawal of such order to appeal in a summary manner to a court of petty sessions having jurisdiction in the district in which the dairy is situated, and the court may either make an order requiring the dairyman to cease from supplying milk, or may vary or rescind any order which has been made by the local authority, and they may at any time withdraw any order made under this section. Pending the disposal of any such appeal the order shall remain in force.'"—(Mr. Strachey.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): I might say I am in hearty sympathy with the wishes of the hon. Member who moved this clause, and I am also a member of the County Councils Association, to whose views he says he is giving effect, but I am bound to say that I have never been able to convince myself that there was any real danger to county authorities, or even to the dignity and reputation of the rural districts, by the clauses which have been asked for by the boroughs. The whole question has been discussed on previous occasions, and I understand that now the opposition to what are known as the model clauses is abandoned, and in its place we are met with what I admit is a far more moderate and defensible proposal, namely, that there should be an appeal against the orders of the corporations in these cases. In principle I entirely agree with that, and so, I believe, does the House as a whole, because there is no Bill before the House, and least of all this Bill, in which there is no appeal clause. My hon. friend has himself pointed out that there is an appeal clause in this Bill, and it stands to reason that in all these Bills which deal not only generally with cases relating to tuberculosis and the general question of the milk supply, but also with a very great number of other questions, following the policy laid down by Parliament in the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, there should be an appeal to the court of quarter sessions. My hon. friend has said, and to a certain extent truly, that the time which no doubt elapses between the meetings of the quarter sessions will in these cases render the appeal to the quarter sessions of no substantial value to the appellant. That also applies to his own clause, because the appeal he proposes is, not to any justices sitting daily, who could deal with the question rapidly and at once, but to justices sitting in petty sessions, and such a court meets only fortnightly, or sometimes even monthly. Therefore, the remedy proposed by my hon. friend is not of very great value. But no great harm would be done if the words were added to the Bill, because I think in practice they would not be made use of. That being so I ask whether there would be any objection in adding them. Even putting aside the unwillingness of a dairyman to drag all his doings and alleged misdoings into a court of quarter sessions or petty sessions, which I think is the strongest argument of all, I have very grave doubts as to whether this clause is really worth the paper on which it is printed. There are many minor objections I might urge. I cannot see why a local authority outside the borough, or why another person aggrieved, who might be a rival dairyman, are to be brought in as possible appellants. I am bound to say I cannot see that any good would be obtained by adding the words to the Bill. I was in very great hopes that the Committee upstairs when they added the appeal clause to the Bill had, to say the least, gone a very long way towards meeting the opposition on this question, but I fail to see that the position would be improved by the adoption of this proposed clause.

COLONEL WELBY (Taunton): I am very sorry I cannot support the new clause proposed by the hon. Member for South Somersetshire, as I have very gladly acted with him in former attempts to alter this particular clause in Corporation Bills. I am obliged to oppose the proposal for two reasons, one sentimental, and the other practical. The sentimental reason is that an elected corporation, like that of Taunton, consisting of twenty members, naturally would not like an appeal from their jurisdiction to perhaps two county magistrates sitting in petty sessions. Such an appeal as that I am certain would lead to friction between the county and the borough. The practical objection is that the petty sessions would have no jurisdiction in the borough, and therefore you would be appealing from a court which had jurisdiction in the borough to another and smaller one which had no jurisdiction there. There is an appeal to quarter sessions contained in the Bill. The quarter sessions have jurisdiction over the borough, but petty sessions have not. It therefore seems to me that you would be introducing a new authority into the borough, and one which would be anything but welcome. After all, it is only a question of whether the milk should be sold in the borough of Taunton. It is not a question of drawing a line around a particular dairy and preventing any dealing with that dairy. It is simply that the milk should not be sold in the borough over which the corporation has jurisdiction, and there is nothing whatever to prevent the whole county outside buying the milk if they care to take the risk.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): So far as I understand the position taken up by the hon. Member for South Somersetshire, he appears to me to have abandoned his opposition to the model clauses as they were framed, and the point seems to be narrowed down to the provision of a proper court of appeal. I will say at once that, so far as that question is concerned, I am willing to confer with all the parties concerned with a view to arriving at a satisfactory solution of the matter. But when I come to examine the proposal before the House, I do not think it is one which can command any support whatever. Let me put briefly how the matter stands as regards these clauses and the milk question. Under the thirty-fifth section of this Bill, if the medical officer of the borough, after having inspected the dairy, and, accompanied by a veterinary surgeon, examined the cows, and obtained a sample of the milk, is of opinion that tuberculosis is, or is likely to be, caused to a person residing in the borough by the consumption of milk supplied from such dairy or any cow kept therein, the following procedure is to be adopted. Let the House listen to what this procedure is: The medical officer must, first of all, report to the corporation, sending in the report furnished to him by the veterinary surgeon; the corporation must then give notice to the dairyman to appear before them to show cause why an order should not be made requiring him not to supply milk within the borough. If in their opinion the dairyman fails to show such cause the corporation may make an order on the dairyman not to supply milk within the borough, and they are bound by the Bill to serve notice of the fact on the county council in whose area the borough is situated, on the Local Government Board, and, in the case of a dairy outside the borough, on the council of the borough or county district in which the borough is situated. The order must be withdrawn by the corporation on their medical officer being satisfied that the milk supply has been changed or is not likely to cause tuberculosis. If any person supplies milk or sells it for consumption in the borough in contravention of such order he becomes liable to a penalty. The House will see, first of all, that there is no prohibition of the supply of milk from an infected area in the county; but the borough authorities merely act for the protection of their own citizens within their own district from a danger of this kind. Surely, that is a power which cannot be denied by the House to any borough authority. But what is proposed to be done? Any person aggrieved by such an order is not denied by this Bill the right of appeal; he has an appeal to quarter sessions under the ninetieth section of this very Bill, and the quarter sessions is an authority which has jurisdiction in the borough, and has power to act within the borough. But what is the proposal made by the hon. Member for Somerset? It is that the corporation, having made this order for the protection of their own citizens, an appeal shall lie—to whom? To the petty sessions of the district in which the dairy is situated. In the first place, that is an authority which has no power to act within the borough at all and whose order would not run even if they issued it. Surely the House is not going to stultify itself by accepting a proposal of that kind. I say it is not fair to the borough to have a court of appeal in which the borough has no voice at all. The borough is the authority aggrieved by the sale of the milk, but under this proposal they would have no voice whatever in the matter. I think when the Bill provides for an appeal to the quarter sessions it is absurd to propose to set up a court of appeal of this kind. That is the main issue upon which the House has to decide. The only question now is the matter of the court of appeal. I agree that there ought to be an appeal, but it ought to be a perfectly independent authority that can decide the matter legitimately as between the borough and the county. I am willing to co-operate with hon. Gentlemen representing both parties in this House, and the Department is willing to co-operate with them in endeavouring to secure unanimity, but a proposal of this kind cannot possibly be accepted; it could not possibly be of any use if it were accepted; it would make confusion worse confounded; it would not benefit the county, and it would give the boroughs a fresh grievance. I must therefore resist the proposal.

SIR JOHN DORINGTON (Gloucestershire, Tewkesbury): I think the arguments put forward by the Secretary to the Local Government Board rather under-estimate the power and effect of sentiment in this matter. There is a curious conflict of opinion between country and town on this question, and if that conflict could be settled the whole matter could be arranged. I was therefore very glad to hear the remarks of the hon. Gentleman with reference to a conference, at which all parties will be represented, to settle this court of appeal. It might very well happen that the city of Bristol now might want to exercise jurisdiction in this matter inside the city of Gloucester—in fact, any municipality might claim to exercise authority within the precincts of another municipality. But the latter municipality would immesay, "No, that will not do. It is quite right that you should be able to prohibit our milk coming into your town; but you must do it by taking action through us." That is the right line to be taken, and that is where the model clauses have gone wrong. What is wanted is general legislation by which it will be right for one authority to call upon another to see that the law is properly carried out. At present friction arises, as is admitted, under the model clauses, because municipal authorities have rights extending possibly to the ruin of individuals residing in another area under another jurisdiction, and I do not see how that is to be removed until some agreement is come to between the parties concerned. The error in the commencement with regard to the model clauses was that the county authorities were not called into conference at all. The Association of Municipal Corporations was one of the conferring parties, but the County Councils Association, an equally important body, was left entirely out of the consideration of the matter. With regard to the question of quarter sessions or petty sessions, one of the faults of the proposal is that the corporation have a decision in the matter—that the corporation, which is not a judicial authority, has to exercise an authority which may ruin an individual in the county. It is all very well to say that the individual has his rights to supply milk everywhere except in that particular borough. It may be that the supply within that borough is the man's whole livelihood. If the Secretary to the Local Government Board will have this conference as to the best court of appeal, it is quite possible the matter can be settled, but unless that conference is agreed to I shall support the Amendment.

*Mr. JONATHAN SAMUEL (Stockton): I hope the House will reject this proposed new clause, because, if passed, it would be a very serious matter for the boroughs of this country. I totally disagree with the remarks of the hon. Member who has just spoken, because I contend that if milk is sold within the borough from dairies affected with tuberculosis outside the borough area the local authority should have power to step in and prevent that milk being sold. The hon. Gentleman stated there was an infringement of the rights of the county council. I do not see where the county council comes in; the county council has no jurisdiction whatever, except in a supervising sense, because the authority is in the hands of the rural or district council for the time being. This clause simply gives the same power as is given under the Public Health Act with regard to diseased meat. When the sanitary inspector or the medical officer of health of a borough finds a diseased carcase in the market he at once obtains an order from the magistrate to destroy it, although that carcase might come from outside the borough area. To place that inspector in a position that he would have to seek the authority of the medical officer outside the borough or the sanitary inspector or the magistrate would certainly place the borough in such a position that it would be unable to protect its inhabitants. Therefore in regard to selling diseased milk inside the borough the local authority ought to have the right to intervene, and if the dairyman feels aggrieved let him go to the quarter sessions. The proposal of the hon. Member is most absurd. Who would ever think of proposing that in ordinary cases the jurisdiction of the judges of a bench inside a borough should be overruled or supervised by a court of petty sessions which may be sitting outside altogether? The only result would be that prejudice would be brought to bear in these cases, and the public would not be protected. I believe the clause as it stands in the Taunton Corporation Bill is a proper one; it is a proper protection to the consumers of milk in our boroughs and urban districts, who ought to be protected, because, after all, it is paramount that the public health should be preserved; and upon these grounds I hope the House will reject the Amendment.

Mr. HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.): I feel sure a large section of the House are somewhat tired of these constant discussions on the question of dairy inspection, and I want to point out why these discussions have been repeated. There are two causes. The first is the reluctance of the Government, and especially of my hon. friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board, to indicate any prospect of general legislation on this important subject. It is absolutely necessary for us to bring these questions up on private Bills, because my hon. friend has set his face against any general legislation on this subject.

*Mr. T. W. RUSSELL was understood to say that all he had done during the session was to adhere to certain clauses which had been agreed to at a conference between the parties interested. Those clauses were now called "model clauses," and had been incorporated in a series of similar Bills. The Local Government Board were one of the parties to the agreement, and they had stood by it.

Mr. HOBHOUSE: However, the result has been practically to substitute for any attempt at general legislation individual clauses in individual Bills. That is what necessitates these constant discussions. My hon. friend has made an offer of a conference with all parties concerned, so I imagine he now recognises the fact, which he absolutely did not recognise last year—that among the parties concerned are the county councils, who have important duties to perform towards the dwellers in their counties. I hope the House will not imagine that as far as the county councils are concerned this question is one of jealousy of the local authorities. Far from it. If my hon. friend had been present when a resolution was passed unanimously the other day by a large meeting representing the different county councils of the kingdom, he would have seen that the ruling feeling among us was simply that those farmers in our districts should not suffer the severe injury they are now exposed to, without having an opportunity of putting their case in due time before a proper judicial authority. I must point out that this question arises directly out of the form in which these model clauses were passed. The mistake to my mind is that of giving the corporation—or not the corporation as a whole, but a committee of the corporation—judicial authority to exclude a farmer from trading in their borough. It is not a question of the borough magistrates. The hon. Member for Stockton referred us to the case of diseased meat, but, as he said himself, that is destroyed by an order of the justices—a judicial authority. There would not be the same objection in that case as if the order was made by a sanitary committee who had no authority to hear persons on oath, and so on. These model clauses, if they had come before the House instead of being settled by a conference upstairs, would have been properly amended. It does not bear argument that a corporation which is not a judicial body should have power to make a judicial order—an order which would injure a dairyman very seriously. It is said that the dairyman has a protection by having the right of appeal to the quarter sessions. In my own county the quarter sessions assemble at intervals of three months, sometimes longer. What you are really saying is that the order of this non-judicial authority is to stand for three months or more, during which time this dairyman may be ruined in his trade, without having the opportunity of appealing to any judicial body whatever. That is why the proposal has been made to appeal to the petty sessions; that Court sits oftener, and I believe in some cases my hon. friend would even go to the borough justices and not to the county justices. The substantial thing is to give a man who is resting under the imputation of a non-judicial body a proper opportunity of appealing within a reasonable time. If the Government would undertake to give us the matter of substance, the matter of form would be a matter of comparative indifference. I do not think, after the speech of the hon. Member representing the borough, that the Corporation of Taunton would be unreasonable, and if an arrangement could be come to, I do not think the Government should stand in the way. After the very important statement of the Secretary to the Local Government Board, I think we should have further time, and therefore I beg to move that the debate be now adjourned.

CAPTAIN PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Woodbridge) formally seconded the motion.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Upon this question I should like to say that the matter is now narrowed down to one of a proper court of appeal. I stated I was ready to confer with the parties, but not on this question as a whole; I never contemplated that. I am willing to confer with all parties interested with a view to getting a suitable court of appeal. As regards this Bill, it has passed the Committee, and I think it ought to go through. I am quite certain the court of appeal proposed in this Amendment would be of no use to anybody, and I hope my hon. friend, after my offer of a conference on this point, will withdraw his motion and allow the Bill to go through.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I ask leave to withdraw my motion, in order that the debate may go on.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

*MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): I am sure none of us would wish to force tuberculosis milk upon any of the boroughs, and as long as they can protect the milk supply of their boroughs without harassing the farmers we should all be satisfied. We do not wish to prevent boroughs taking all reasonable precautions, but it has been considered that if it was left in the power of one county justice to make an order of inspection and then of the corporation to make an order prohibiting the introduction of the milk into the borough, an injustice might be done to the farmer, who has not been called. The Secretary to the Local Government Board has promised to consider this matter, and to draw up rules appointing a proper court of appeal. I cannot help thinking that that is exactly what we want. At the County Councils Association, the other day, the hon. Member for East Somersetshire brought up a motion, which was passed, but the motion was merely that there should be a court of appeal to which the farmer could appeal. My hon. friend's Amendment reads—

"It shall be open to any local authority, dairyman, or person aggrieved by any such order——"

What does he mean by "any such order"? Does he mean the order which the county magistrate first of all gives for the inspection, or the order which the corporation make prohibiting the supply?

MR. STRACHEY: The order of the corporation.

*MR. JEFFREYS: Then I think it is wrong in the order in which it is placed, because it is proposed to place this at the end of line 25.

MR. STRACHEY explained that there was a difference in the printing of the Bill.

*MR. JEFFREYS: At any rate, it is the order of the corporation. Is the appeal to the borough sessions or to the county sessions? There would be a great difficulty in appealing from the borough magistrates to the county quarter sessions, and vice versâ. All this my hon. friend below me has promised to consider, and to appoint a proper court of appeal.

MR. STRACHEY: But not on this Bill.

*MR. JEFFREYS: No; but it must be remembered that this Bill has to go through another stage in another House, and if a conference were called and an appeal clause agreed to it might be inserted in another place just as well as in this House. Other Bills have already passed through all their stages in this House, and it is too late to discuss them; but if this appeal clause were agreed to it could be inserted in all the other Bills as well. It seems to me that my hon. friend has promised the most reasonable course. I should like to remind the House that this order is in force in London under the Public Health (London) Act, 1883, exactly the same order runs, but it has not been felt to operate harshly. At the meeting of the County Councils Association the other day a farmer said he supplied London with a large quantity of milk, and it would be a very great hardship if this order were made upon him prohibiting the supply. I reminded him that the order could be made at any time now, and, although he had been supplying milk to London for years, he had no idea that this power existed. That shows that it cannot operate very harshly, and so long as it is safeguarded by the appeal which the secretary to the Local Government Board promises to give, I think the hon. Member for South Somersetshire and his supporters ought to be satisfied; they will get what they want, they will get what the County Councils Association wants, and they will get protection from any injustice which might be done to the farmers. I therefore think my hon. friend would be wise if he withdrew his Amendment.

*COLONEL PILKINGTON (Lancashire, Newton): It has been suggested that it is infra dig. for a corporation to appear before the petty sessions outside the borough, but as far as that goes I think there is nothing in it at all, because corporations are the same as individuals in that they are amenable to the law of the country, and they have to appear before courts to justify their action. I cannot see that there would be any great difficulty in the Corporation of Taunton having to plead its case before a court of petty sessions outside the borough. It is not a question of one authority against another; it is a question of the whole of the proceedure before the courts, and the humblest individual in the land has just as much right before a court of law as the most powerful corporation. In regard to this question of appeal, is it not an injustice that a farmer supplying milk should have to wait for three months before he had a chance of bringing on his appeal? I think it is quite clear that a court of appeal ought certainly to be instituted before any Bill of this nature is passed. The cart is before the horse in this case.

The Government have had plenty of time to put this most important question right before passing private Bills where individuals are affected. With regard to this question of boroughs appealing before county magistrates and so on, all over the country, the decision of the borough magistrates is subject in many cases to the decision of the county magistrates sitting at quarter sessions. Therefore, it appears to me that we are greatly indebted to my hon. friend the Member for South Somersetshire for having made the first proposal in the direction of establishing a reasonable court of appeal which shall sit at a reasonable time. It appears to have been forgotten that the corporations in any number can proceed against a milk seller and get a conviction against him. A corporation in Lancashire, for instance, may proceed against a farmer outside their area in regard to the sale of milk. They may prove their case and get a conviction against that man, but surely that is ample treatment. If the corporation are going to ask for these strong orders to stop the sale of milk, we ought to have on the other side proper machinery for an appeal, and a quick appeal in a case like the one I have mentioned. Supposing a man is convicted of selling such milk, and he has to wait for three months for the court of appeal to hear his case, he would be ruined in the meantime. I think some hon. Members who have spoken upon this question appear to think that this provision only applies in the borough, but the moment that order takes effect the man is subject to it, not only in the borough, but also in the county, and the farmer has to sit down under a very unpleasant order. Naturally and rightly with the members of a corporation their patriotism is local, and it is only right that a court of appeal should be set up where justice can be done, and done speedily if the order is to be carried out. I think the proposal of my hon. friend the Member for Somerset is a most sensible one in this direction.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): What has been clearly brought forward in this debate is that the authority will be the sanitary committee of the town council. There ought to be an appeal of some sort to a body who can deal with it at once. The proposal of the hon. Member for South Somersetshire is not perhaps exactly what we all wish for, but he has stated that he is prepared to accept any suggestion to improve the clause or any reasonable proposal to establish a court of appeal to deal with the matter at once. Of course, an appeal to the court of quarter sessions is absurd, because a delay of three months would ruin anybody. I will suggest that the House pass this clause, and that the representative of the Local Government Board shall afterwards put in such an Amendment as he thinks proper for the protection of town councils, instead of giving a point blank "no" to the protection of the former by his own authority.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: It is perfectly impossible to amend the clause.

MR. WARNER: I must differ from the hon. Member upon that point, for I never knew a clause yet which it was not possible to amend. It may be amended in many ways, even if it has to be done at a further stage of the Bill. What is wanted is some pledge that something will be done in this Bill for the protection of the farmer and to give a right of appeal in his own district, instead of being under the control of somebody he has nothing to do with, and being at the mercy of the sanitary authority of some small town council.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): This is an immensely important question. When the hon. Member opposite drew attention to the fact that the City of London had powers similar to those proposed to be given in this Bill, I think he and other hon. Members were not aware of the fact that the whole of this question of milk inspections is in process of revolution. Under the old system of sanitary laws these powers of milk inspection were confined to cases of evident disease in cows, and to the inspection of dairies where there was some disease that could be immediately detected by any person who had a fair amount of knowledge. But, as hon. Members are well aware, within the last two or three years a complete revolution has taken place in this matter, and doctrines and theories have been started, no doubt with excellent foundation, by medical experts as to the widespread existence of tuberculosis amongst cattle and cows resulting in danger to the public health which were quite unknown some years ago. The existence of tuberculosis in cattle is not at all an evident matter; in fact, in many stages, it is extremely difficult to determine. The first point I would draw attention to is that when you come to deal with the examination of dairies with a view of preventing the sale of milk containing the germs of tuberculosis, you have to deal with a case requiring a great deal of medical skill, and a peculiar form of scientific training. That being the case, it is perfectly manifest that, in the case of a great many municipal authorities in this country, it cannot be expected that they will have in their employment men of sufficient skill and training whose decision would be infallible in a matter of this kind. For many years to come, it will be unreasonable to expect that men of really expert training will be at the disposal of every town which requires them. Whilst those of us representing country districts recognise the justice of the demand on the part of all municipalities to have full and most stringent powers to protect themselves against the sale of milk infected with tuberculosis in their district, we are entitled to ask for some machinery which will afford the unfortunate farmer protection against orders such as those which are contemplated in this Bill. What would be the position of a farmer proceeded against under this clause? Take the case of a man whose whole living depends upon the sale of milk. He will be forbidden to sell his milk in the only market he has got. Not only this, but the order which is to be made under this section is to be served on the district council or county council, and the man is to be boycotted, and the alleged character of his dairy is to be published all over the country, and his premises will be avoided as a sanitary plague. If the order happens to be based upon a mistake, the position of the unfortunate farmer will be that for three months his entire business will be brought to a standstill, and the man would be entirely ruined before he could make an appeal. The hon. Member who represents the Government on this occasion, recognises that it would be an intolerable grievance for a farmer to have to wait for such a long period for an appeal. I must confess that I shall be disposed to vote for this Amendment, because I think the case against the clause is unanswerable. I think it would be an unwise thing to give power to one or two local magistrates to force such milk on the town against the desire of the town council or municipal authority. On the other hand, I think it is a great hardship, amounting almost to cruelty, to a farmer if he is to be left at the mercy of an order of this kind —which may turn out to have been improperly made—for a period of three months, during which the man may be utterly and absolutely ruined without any just cause. The Secretary to the Local Government Board says he recognises that such a case cannot be defended, and that some proper court of appeal ought to be instituted. I followed his speech very closely, and I noticed that he did not constitute any court of appeal in this Bill, nor did he mention any period by which he would have his proposals ready to do this; neither did he say how they would be submitted to the House. I do think we ought to have some definite statement, before we allow this Bill to pass, that before the session closes some general scheme will be submitted by the Government establishing a satisfactory court of appeal in this matter. I desire to say a word or two upon what I think the only satisfactory court of appeal should be. I do not think you will be able to get a satisfactory court of appeal all at once. What you require is a court of appeal which will be rapid in its action and also inexpensive. There would be a natural tendency to set up an antagonism between town and country upon this question, and my notion of a court of appeal would be that if the farmer does not think he is really in the wrong in the matter a perfectly simple process would be that he should have the right to get down an expert from the Local Government Board, who should be a thoroughly trained and skilled scientific man, who can really determine whether there is tuberculosis matter in the milk. The farmer should have the right to get this expert down from headquarters, who should proceed to hold an inquiry and bring to bear on the subject not only evidence, but his own skill and knowledge in dealing with the subject matter of investigation. I believe it is in this direction, and this direction alone, that you can look for a satisfactory court of appeal. I do think the Government ought to give some assurance that before the end of the session they will bring before the House of Commons their proposal for a court of appeal, and not leave for an indefinite period this most serious matter in a state of uncertainty. I ground that appeal strongly upon my conviction that most properly and most necessarily a revolution has taken place in the whole question of milk inspection, and we have got to deal not with a matter of which we can judge by precedent, but with an entirely new state of things. I hope the inspection will be conducted in a much more rigorous and effectual manner than was ever dreamt of two or three years ago.

MR. RENSHAW (Renfrewshire, W.) said that under the Scotch procedure the provision made for an appeal to the sheriff worked exceedingly well. He did not know what was the nearest approach to a Scotch sheriff in England, but his own opinion was that it would be a county court judge. In view of the course which the discussion had taken he suggested that the Secretary to the Local Government Board should give some undertaking to those who had moved this Amendment in this House to insert a clause to meet the difficulty between the time when the Bill left this House and its passage through the House of Lords. The conference which the Secretary to the Local Government Board had suggested could take place, so that any decision arrived at by that conference could be dealt with in the House of Lords. He very much sympathised with the general principle expressed by his hon. friend the Member for South Somersetshire.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: An appeal has now been made to me to endeavour to arrange a conference, so that any compromise that may be arrived at can be inserted in the Bill before it passes through the House of Lords. In the first place, conferences are not things that can be summoned at a moment's notice, and it may not be very easy to come to an agreement when that conference takes place. I think it will be recognised that there are some difficulties in the way of the conference suggested. I admit that the court of appeal is an absolute necessity. In the second place, I wish to point out that under no circumstances can we accept this Amendment or this court of appeal, because it is unworkable and mischievous in every sense of the word. I shall use my best endeavours to have a conference with all the parties interested in this question at once. I can go no further than that, and if it is possible to arrange matters at that conference I shall throw no difficulty in the way of a clause being introduced into this Bill in the House of Lords in order to carry out any satisfactory compromise which may be arrived at.

*MR. SEELY (Lincoln) said he thought that the hon. Member opposite might accept the solution of the difficulty suggested by the Secretary to the Local Government Board. He considered that while it was most essential to deal with the sale of such milk, it was not reasonable that a committee of the corporation should, without any appeal whatever, have the right to practically ruin a particular farmer, because that is what it would amount to. At the same time he did not think that county magistrates should be given authority within the borough either directly or indirectly under this clause. He thought the only solution was something in the nature of an appeal either to the county court judge, as was suggested by the hon. Member for Renfrewshire, or to the borough magistrates. He was not sure that the borough magistrates would not make a perfectly satisfactory court of appeal. The Secretary to the Local Government Board had stated that the clause could not be amended; but, as a matter of fact, the introduction of a few words would alter it and make it quite a practical one. He thought the best course to adopt under the circumstances was to have this clause withdrawn, and accept the pledge given by the Local Government Board in the hope that after the conference a satisfactory clause to meet the difficulty would be inserted in another place. Of course they could not bind the House of Lords, but he did not think they would find them particularly hostile.

MR. MALCOLM (Suffolk, Stowmarket): I should like some further explanation as to what the real difficulty is of providing for a court of appeal in this Bill. The Secretary to the Local Government Board has told us that it is important to have such a court of appeal, but at the same time he says that in the present Bill nothing will induce him to put anything of the kind in it. If such a proposal is good for future legislation I should have thought that it was good for present legislation also. I think the conference suggested is hardly good enough for country Members. If that conference decides in a certain way, I should like to know if the hon. Gentleman will do all he can to get a clause to that effect inserted in another place. The hon. Gentleman must know now whether he is going to put this in or not, and if he has any doubt about it I think that the wisest and best thing we could do would be to adjourn the question until he has had this conference.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: I have no desire to trouble the House a second time with a speech, but I simply want to point out that if hon. Members desire that this matter should be gone into I believe it would not be out of order to move that the Bill be recommitted in order to insert such a clause as has been suggested. That course would allow a conference to take place, and by allowing this stage of the Bill to pass the House does not necessarily deprive itself of a further opportunity of dealing with the matter.

MR. STRACHEY: I should be quite ready, if the House accepted the Second Reading of this clause, to agree to the Amendment suggested by the hon. Member for West Renfrewshire and the hon. Member for Lincoln.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is under a misapprehension; this is not moved as a new clause, but simply as an Amendment.

MR. STRACHEY: My hon. friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board practically says that he will accept no compromise whatever, and I do not think there is anything for us to do but to proceed to a division.

MR. PHILIPPS (Pembrokeshire): My hon. friend the Secretary to the Local Government Board says that he will not accept this Amendment, but at the same time he says that the Bill will not be satisfactory as it stands. What he offers to do is that if the Bill is allowed to leave this House in its present shape he will get a conference together, and if that conference agrees upon something which he says it will be very difficult to get them to agree upon—if these difficult things come to pass—he will endeavour to get a clause inserted to meet the case in another place. What I wish to ask is whether the hon. Gentleman will not go a step further. He admits that this Bill in its existing shape requires amendment, but he is not satisfied with this Amendment. Will he definitely promise that whatever the conference does, or whether it comes to any decision or not, the Government will put in an Amendment in another place to meet this difficulty? Surely it is a reasonable thing to give a pledge of this kind when the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board admits that the Bill may create a great injustice to farmers.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I have already gone as far as it is possible for a Department to go in this matter. If the House accepts this Amendment it will put an impossible provision in the Bill, and I think I have made a perfectly fair offer.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE (IRELAND) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.) said there was an Amendment on the Paper in the name of the hon. Member for North Louth, and in place of it he should move another. The Bill consisted practically of two parts, and the discussion on the previous night was mainly devoted to the first portion. The second half chiefly related to the method in which the tithes were variable. It was impossible to discuss this clause without referring to the general provisions contained in the Bill with reference to the variation of the tithe in the future. The Amendment he had to move in lieu of that standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Louth was to the effect that the tithe rent-charge should be varied in accordance, not with the variation in judicial rents, but with the difference in prices and the cost of cultivation. If the proposal were carried, the first subsection of the clause would read as follows—

"As soon as possible after the passing of this Act, the Land Commissioner, having regard to the difference in prices affecting agriculture and the cost of cultivation in the counties, poor law unions, or other areas, between the fifteen years expiring on the 1st day of November next after the passing of this Act and the previous fifteen years, shall on any application to vary the tithe rent-charge in such area, and on proof that the applicant is entitled to have the same varied under the laws existing before the passing of this Act determine with reference to such area what variation, if any, ought in equity to be made in tithe rent-charge payable in respect of any hereditament situate in such area other than the tithe rent-charges payable to the Land Commission."

The clause of the Bill under consideration, like the first clause, constituted a most revolutionary proposal. He was referring, of course, also to the clauses which followed, and particularly to the third clause, for which this second clause was laying the foundation. The existing system of tithe variation, as they knew, was a most complicated one, and the right hon. Gentleman by his Bill proposed to sweep it away and to substitute for it an automatic variation of tithe rent-charge. This proposal might possibly be defended if the original tithe-owners or their descendants had never sold or leased the tithe rent-charges to other people. But in regard to the particular cases in which they had been sold and with which some attempt was made by the clause to deal, and especially in regard to those tithe rent-charges which were determined by the Act of 1872 to be invariable for the future, he maintained that the clause was absolutely revolutionary. Take, for instance, the case of tithe rent-charges payable to the Land Commission. They were declared by the Act of 1872 to be no longer variable. There was a good reason for that declaration. The question was fully debated at the time, and the settlement arrived at was supposed to be final. On the supposition that it was final, the Land Commission in their treatment of the Church fund had made their calculations on that basis. To now undo that settlement after a lapse of twenty-eight years, and without anybody having asked that the tithes should be varied, was as bad as anything that was done or contemplated by the Parliament of James II. which the English Unionists had so vehemently protested against, especially during the Home Rule agitation. If that settlement were to be undone, especially after the funds had already been allocated to public purposes in Ireland, he could not imagine any answer to any demand which might be made in the future for the undoing of any settlement whatever. He would really like to hear some defence of the proposal. Take again the case of the lay tithes. In many cases they had been sold; they had been treated as articles of commerce; they had passed out of the landlords' hands and were now in the hands of all sorts of people. They had in many cases been acquired as investments for trustees, and this particular property had gone on changing hands for valuable consideration, the sale always being made on the supposition that the tithe was not variable. Yet now a Unionist Government, a Government of great conservators of property, and of great upholders of contract, proposed to abolish the system under which property had passed from hand to hand and family to family for the last fifty years, and to substitute a totally different principle for it!

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is now discussing the whole Bill. As far as I can gather from the Amendment he read out, the only point now to be discussed by the Committee is whether it will accept the proposal contained in the Bill, viz., that the variation in judicial rent is to be taken as the standard of variation, or whether it will agree with the hon. Member that any alteration in prices is to be the standard.

MR. CLANCY: But I propose a very important addition—namely, "That on any application to vary tithe rent-charge in such area and on proof that the applicant is entitled to have the same varied under the laws existing before the passing of this Act," etc.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Perhaps the hon. Member will bring his Amendment to the Table.

MR. CLANCY did so, and on returning to his seat said he wished to explain the meaning of the words he had quoted. They had reference to the old system under which tithes were varied. He could not discuss this clause without referring to that particular subject, because its object was to lay a foundation for Clause 3. The system on which tithes had been varied in the past was a very complicated one and very difficult to work. It had not been very successful. He was glad to have the assent of the Chief Secretary to that.

*THE CHAIRMAN: As I understand it, the part of the hon. Member's Amendment dealing with the variation of tithe rent-charge is not in order on this clause at all. It should come on the next clause. I shall therefore have to strike those words out of the Amendment.

MR. CLANCY: I bow to your ruling, of course. I thought the same point was raised in the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Louth. It seems to me to be most convenient for the Government and for the Committee to discuss the whole question on the present Amendment. I should think the right hon. Gentleman will not object to that.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The hon. Member must not take me as not objecting. This is purely a question of order. My experience is that when questions have been discussed on one Amendment they have been raised over and over again on other Amendments.

MR. CLANCY: My appeal was not to the right hon. Gentleman, but to the Chairman. I submit it is more convenient to take the debate now. I do not wish to detain the House unnecessarily.—The hon. Member then went on to point out the difficulties which attended the present system of variation. Questions arose frequently as to who were really the owners of the tithe; it was not always possible to find in one parish three persons to sign the necessary notice; and the notices had to be given at a certain fixed period, and were directed to be posted on the principal outer door of the parish church, whereas sometimes there was no principal outer door, and even no parish church; and, finally, if the difference in price between one standard of comparison and another did not exceed 10 per cent., then the application for the variation of the tithe could not be granted at all. The result of these manifold requirements, as every lawyer knew, was that the variation of tithe was rendered almost impossible. People had bought on the supposition that this difficulty existed. They had taken leases——

*THE CHAIRMAN: The only part of the Amendment in order on this clause is that which suggests that the prices of agricultural produce shall be taken as the standard, instead of the change in judicial rents. The remainder is a matter for future discussion.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Is it not a fact that this clause proposes to substitute for the old method of varying tithe a new basis of variation; and is it not perfectly competent for us to compare the old method with the new?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member was not comparing the two methods. I do not gather that he has attempted to do that.

MR. CLANCY: Technically, perhaps, I may not be in order; but I put it to the Committee whether it would not be convenient to discuss this matter once and for all.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think it is very inconvenient. The best thing is to take each Amendment as it comes up.

MR. CLANCY said he was afraid that that would greatly lengthen the discussion. He failed to see that the right hon. Gentleman had given any special reasons for his proposal. One great objection on the part of those who represented the public interest in Ireland, as distinct from the landlord class, was that these judicial rents were rents in regard to which—and for the greater part of the last fourteen or fifteen years—no proper distinction had been drawn between reductions effected in respect of changing circumstances and those made in respect of improvements made by the tenants. If it were possible to draw such a distinction—and he feared it was not—then there might be something to be said for substituting the new principle for the old. This was, however, a fatal objection, as it gave the landlords advantages to which they were not entitled, and for their benefit an inroad was being made for no reason whatever on a public fund devoted to public purposes. The idea was to get the largest possible reduction for the landlord class. The modified form he suggested had the sanction of convenience, custom, and tradition; and as one representing public interests, which were deeply concerned in inroads upon the Church Fund, he could not consent to the Government proposal. After the ruling of the Chairman he thought he had better put aside his own Amendment and adopt that of the hon. Member for North Louth, which he begged to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 23, to leave out from the word 'Commission,' to the word 'shall,' in page 2, line 4, and insert the words 'having regard to the difference in prices affecting agriculture in counties, poor law unions, or other areas, between the fifteen years expiring on the first day of November next after the passing of this Act and the previous fifteen years.'"—(Mr. Clancy.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out to the word 'and,' in page 2, line 4, stand part of the clause."

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.) said he considered the course proposed in the clause to be a very dangerous one. The matter should be settled as heretofore, and the tithes should not be varied at all. The Irish Land Commission was a body not favourable to the Irish tenants, and if it had power it would exercise it in favour of the landlords and against the tenants. He therefore felt that his hon. friends were perfectly right in opposing the clause. The manner in which the Irish Land Commission collected statistics was to send representatives to fairs, and he had known himself that excessive prices had often been collected. Oftentimes the representative of the Land Commission met the person who had obtained the highest or the lowest price at the fair, and he did not consider that a fair criterion on which to fix prices throughout the whole of Ireland. He hoped his hon. friends would oppose the clause.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The speech just delivered by the hon. Gentleman leaves me in doubt whether he has either read the clause or the Amendment, and it also leaves me in doubt whether he intends to support the Amendment or not. What is the question raised by this Amendment? It is that we shall substitute for the proposal in the clause a provision stating that the Land Commission shall have regard to the difference in prices affecting agriculture in counties, poor-law unions, or other areas between the fifteen years expiring on the 1st November next and the previous fifteen years. According to the hon. Gentleman's speech the Land Commission is not an efficient body to collect prices, and in that case, of course, he ought to vote against the Amendment; but there are greater objections to the Amendment than those which the hon. Member has just laid before the Committee. What is proposed under the Amendment is that the prices from 1885 to 1900 should be compared with the prices from 1870 to 1885, but as a matter of fact there are no records of prices from 1870 to 1885, and on that ground alone the Committee will see that it would be impracticable to adopt the Amendment. One of the objections urged by the hon. Member for North Louth on the Second Reading of the Bill was that we proposed to put too great a responsibility on the Land Commission. The Land Commissioners, it was said, were the guardians of the Church Fund, and it was not right that they should have any interest in fixing figures by which the fund would be affected. But our proposal, which is automatic, depends on the rents fixed by the Sub-Commissioners all over Ireland, and would throw nothing like the responsibility on the Land Commissioners that the Amendment would, because the Amendment provides that the Land Commissioners shall not only determine prices in these different areas, but shall also determine how far the tithe rent-charge should be equitably reduced. Under these circumstances we cannot accept the Amendment. It would involve a responsibility which ought not to be placed on the Land Commissioners.

MR. DILLON: The speech to which we have just listened illustrates very forcibly the extraordinary position to which we have been brought by the methods adopted in connection with this Bill. The chief part of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman dealt with the tail of the Amendment which has just been cut off.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Only one sentence.

MR. DILLON: I want to direct the attention of the Committee to the fact that by the cutting off of the tail of the Amendment we have in the first place rendered it unreadable—it will not fit into the clause—and in the next place the meaning of the Amendment has been absolutely altered, and a very valuable Amendment it was. You are substituting for the law which existed for half a century a new method of machinery for varying the tithe rent-charge, and it is absolutely outside the scope of human intelligence to debate an Amendment on Clause 2 or Clause 3 without referring to the whole of the machinery you propose. Clause 2 leads up to Clause 3, and has no meaning or purpose except as considered with Clause 3. Clause 2 proposes to substitute a new basis of variation for the old system, and my point is that if at the beginning of Clause 2 you lay down the machinery, you govern the whole of the discussion on the remainder of Clause 2, and also on Clause 3. Therefore I maintain, with all due respect and submission to the Chair, and without the slightest intention of controverting the Chairman's decision, that the entire Amendment is in order. It was drafted by the hon. Member for North Louth, who is undoubtedly and by admission a past master in the art of drafting Amendments. The Amendment was put down for the purpose of altering the entire machinery by which it is proposed to vary the tithe rent-charge, and if it were carried it would affect materially, and necessitate consequential alterations in, Clause 3. I hold that it is impossible to discuss the machinery and method of the variation of the tithe rent-charge with due regard to order after the first sub-section of Clause 2 is passed, because if you impose on the Land Commission the duty of ascertaining the average reduction in judicial rents, it will then be argued that we have laid down the principle; because it may be said, "Why should the Land Commission ascertain the variation respecting judicial rents if not for the purpose of varying the tithe rent-charge?" According to your ruling, Sir, the whole Clause will be turned into nonsense if this Amendment is left as it is. The Amendment proposes to leave out all the words from "Commission," in line 23, page 1, to "and" in page 2, line 4, and to substitute the following words—

"Having regard to the difference in prices affecting agriculture in counties, poor-law unions, or other areas, between the fifteen years expiring on the first day of November next after the passing of this Act and the previous fifteen years shall determine with reference to such areas what variation (if any) ought equitably to be made in the tithe rent-charge payable in respect of hereditaments situate in such area."

The result of your ruling, even with the consequential Amendment to leave out the word "and," would be that the meaning of the Amendment would be totally different to what was intended. It was never contemplated that the tithe rent-charge should be varied in direct ratio to the variation of prices. That was not the Amendment at all. The proposition in the Bill is that the tithe rent-charge should vary with the same variation as the judicial rents. The Amendment proposed to substitute a different proposal — not that the tithe rent-charge should vary in direct proportion to the variation in prices—but that having regard to the variation of prices, the Land Commission shall determine what variation (if any) ought equitably to be made. It proposes to leave it to the Land Commission, in the first place, to determine whether there is any equitable case for variation at all; and in the second place, supposing there is, what variation should be made; but no one ever dreamt of laying down the proposition that the variation in tithe should be in direct ratio to the variation of prices. As now presented, however, the Amendment contains a diametrically opposite proposal to what was intended. I have been very much impressed by our experience during the debates on this Bill. It is a Bill of vast importance to Ireland, and with the exception of the Local Government Bill it is the most important measure introduced during this Parliament. And yet look at the condition of the House. Is it not enough to make an Irish Member despair? There are two or three unfortunate hungry Irish landlords looking on and waiting for their share of the Church Fund; there is a body of Irish Nationalists on this side, and five or six English Members, while a Bill, very technical and very difficult, dealing with a great public fund badly required for public uses in Ireland, is under discussion. Hon. Members are scattered over the reading-rooms and dining-rooms of this House, and they will come in to vote without knowing in the least what a particular Amendment is about. It is perfectly outrageous; and yet we are told we have only got to come to this great intelligent and impartial Legislature to get all our demands considered. I venture to affirm with absolute confidence that, of the English Members voting on these various Amendments, not one in a 100 has the faintest conception of them. I think it is disheartening that we should be compelled to carry on this debate under such extraordinary circumstances. With reference to this Amendment, I do not know whether to support it or oppose it. The Amendment on the Paper is, I think, perfectly in order.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Mr. CRILLY, Mayo, N.). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

MR. DILLON (continuing): I have been endeavouring to explain the difficulty we are in in connection with this Amendment. As the Amendment appeared on the Paper it would receive my most hearty support, because it raised a most important issue; but the tail of the Amendment has been ruled out of order, and the extraordinary result is that it now has, as I submit, an entirely opposite effect to what was intended. I cannot see how it can be contended that it is out of order to debate the whole question of the machinery for the revision of tithe rent-charge on the first sub-section of Clause 2, when if the the sub-section is allowed to remain as it is you prejudge to a very considerable extent the question of the machinery to be provided. I think we are entitled, therefore, to know whether we are not at liberty to move the Amendment as it appears on the Paper.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member appears to think that this is the first Amendment ever appearing on the Paper that has been ruled out of order. Part of the Amendment is in order, and part of it is out of order. Clause 2 lays down the standard which is to be arrived at by some means or other by the Land Commission as to the variation which should take place in tithe rent-charge. The Amendment on the Paper suggests another means of arriving at that standard. Clause 3 goes on to say that, having arrived at that standard showing the variation now existing as compared with fifteen years ago, it is to be applied in dealing with tithe rent-charge. The matter is divided into two sections instead of being in one. It is quite impossible to allow an Amendment on one of these clauses which would really give the go-by to the subject-matter contained in the other. The proper course for the hon. Member, if he does not approve of my ruling, is to withdraw the Amendment and object to the whole clause. The hon. Member says that by accepting the first and remaining sections of Clause 2 his hands are tied with regard to Clause 3; but it is open to him to move the rejection of Clause 2, and having got rid of it he could then suggest some other means for varying tithe rent-charge to that suggested in the Bill.

MR. DILLON: There is very considerable difficulty in dealing with this Amendment under these restrictions. I did not imagine that no Amendment on the Paper had ever been ruled out of order. I suppose 500 of my own have been ruled out of order during my Parliamentary career; but in this particular instance the effect of the operation is of a most extraordinary character, because it has completely altered the Amendment, and the clause will not read. The clause as it stands is quite clear, but the ruling of the Chair with regard to the Amendment has thrown the matter into confusion. The sense of the Amendment is altered, and I contend that it does not read into the clause at all.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): If I am in order, may I most respectfully ask you, Mr. Chairman, to read the whole Amendment now, so that I may know exactly what I have to deal with?

*THE CHAIRMAN: I endeavoured to save the Amendment as far as I could by cutting out only that which was disorderly. Of course, I am not responsible for the original form of the Amendment. The Amendment will read—

> "As soon as possible after the passing of this Act the Land Commissioners, having regard to the difference in prices affecting agriculture in counties, poor law unions, or other areas, between the fifteen years expiring on the 1st day of November next, after the passing of this Act, and the previous fifteen years, shall certify the average percentage which such variation represents."

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: As that stands there is no variation to which the "such" refers. As the Amendment originally stood there was a variation of one period of fifteen years, and another period of fifteen years, and the Land Commission was to—> "determine, with reference to such areas, what variation, if any, ought equitably to be made in the tithe rent-charge payable in respect of hereditaments situate in such areas."

Thus the words "such variation" has reference to what was contemplated by the hon. and learned Member for North Louth. But even as the Amendment now stands on the Paper it raises a very important question of principle, because undoubtedly what is sought by Section 2, and which will be somewhat qualified by the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for North Louth, is to confiscate a very considerable portion of the Church Fund of Ireland. The effect of making the reduction of rents by the Land Commissioners the standard by which the rent-charge is to be raised or lowered will be to lop off some 20 or 25 per cent. from the existing tithe rent-charge. That is a very serious step. I am very glad that there are even forty Members of the House now present, because last night, when the House was full, and when an opportunity might have been offered to explain to English and Scotch Members the morass into which the Government was leading the House, we were closured on Clause 1. Now that there are a few Members here, I want to call their attention to what has been done on this Clause 2. We are practically reducing the tithe rent-charge now payable in Ireland by 25 per cent. That is a very great boon, undoubtedly, to the tithe-payer, but in doing that we are repealing one of the most solemn statutes on the Statute-book—namely, the Act which disestablished the Irish Church. That was the result of a long period of agitation, and was forced upon this House by the Imperial necessities of the time.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I rise to a point of order. Surely the application of this provision to the period of fifty years rent-charge is a matter that will be more conveniently raised later on.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: I am not speaking now of the difference between ecclesiastical and lay tithes; I am speaking of the meaning, if it has any, of this section, and the standard by which the tithe rent-charge is to be reduced by 25 per cent. That is my proposition, and if it is wrong it can be met by argument. What I was going to say to recently arrived English and Scottish Members of this House was that by the 68th section of the Church Act a trust is imposed upon the Church Fund which we have no right to violate or break, and which, if it were a private trust, could not be violated. What is that trust? By the 68th section of the Act it is declared that the surplus of the Church Fund is to be devoted "to the relief of unavoidable calamity and suffering in Ireland." That is at the basis of all Irish legislation for the last thirty-one years.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is now travelling beyond the limits of the Amendment, to which he must confine himself.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): With great respect, Mr. Lowther, on a point of order, is not my right hon. friend justified in describing the effect of the proposed standard of variation in the clause, and in showing that that effect is in fraud of the Church Fund?

*THE CHAIRMAN: There are two alternatives now before the Committee, as I have repeatedly pointed out. One alternative is that a standard should be fixed by the Land Commission on the basis of judicial rents, and the other alternative is that the basis to be taken should be the prices of agricultural produce. That is now the question before the Committee, and the only one. As to whether any standard should be fixed at all, that will come on for debate on the question that Clause 2 stand part of the Bill.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is not my right hon. friend absolutely in order in showing what the effect on the Church Fund would be of the section now before the House if it is not modified by the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Member for North Louth?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman has not referred to the Amendment, and was not discussing the second alternative; he was discussing the effect of the whole case.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: How could I convey two sentences in one breath? The object of this clause is to alter the old existing standard, and how can I possibly argue that this clause is imperfect or bad, and that the Amendment would improve it, unless I called the attention of the House to the history of this matter?

*THE CHAIRMAN: In my opinion, that ought to be gone into when the question is put that Clause 2 stands part of the Bill. I do not think it is competent to go into history upon an Amendment which would take another basis for variation from that in the clause as it stands. The right hon. Gentleman may compare the two methods in arriving at his conclusions.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: I bow, with the utmost deference, to your ruling, and shall endeavour, if possible, to keep myself within it. Now, what reason has been assigned, either to-day or when the Bill was introduced, for this organic change in the standard for fixing the tithe rent-charge in Ireland, which has existed for more than seventy years? The Act which regulated the mode by which tithe rent-charge, or tithe composition, was fixed was 2 and 3 William IV. It was a perfectly fair mode. They were to ascertain the average price of wheat or corn, according to whether wheat or corn was the staple cereal of the district, for the previous seven years, and when so ascertained to compare the average of seven years with seven years, and vary the tithe rent-charge according to the variation resulting from that comparison. Now that law has never been changed; but this Bill comes in and suggests a change in the system deliberately adopted nearly seventy years ago. What has occurred to make such a change desirable? The object of the Amendment is that if you will have a new system let it approach as closely as possible to the old system, and let it be regulated not by fixing it on judicial rents—the effect of which will be, as I have said, to reduce the Church property growing out of tithe rent-charge by 25 per cent—but by fixing it on the prices of wheat and corn in particular areas. That is the way I was coming to the object of the Amendment, and to ground my reasoning why the Amendment should be adopted. The Amendment says—

"The Land Commission, having regard to the differences in prices affecting agriculture in counties, poor-law unions, or other areas, between the fifteen years expiring on the first day of November next after the passing of this Act and the previous fifteen years shall determine with reference to such areas what variation, if any, ought equitably to be made in the tithe rent-charge payable in respect of hereditaments situated in such area."

That is following exactly the principle of the old valuation, and the words are in substance the same as those in Section 6 of the Act 2 and 3 William IV., chapter 119, which is as follows—

"That all compositions heretofore or which may hereafter be made and established in any parish shall . . . . remain and endure for ever, or until the same shall have been redeemed or extinguished . . . . but subject, nevertheless, to such variation from time to time . . . . in the amount of such compositions as hereafter mentioned; that is to say, in respect of all compositions heretofore made and established, to variation at such periods as such compositions may now be respectively liable to; and in respect of such compositions as may be invariable during the whole period of twenty-one years for which they may have been made, to variation at the termination of such period, and thenceforth at any time between the First of May and First of November in each succeeding seventh year; and in respect of all such compositions hereafter to be established, to variation between the First of May and First of November in each seventh year next after the day from which each such composition shall commence."

All that the Amendment does is to substitute fifteen years for seven years. Why alter this old standard, and make the standard the result of the judicial rents? It is only to placate the supporters of the Government in Ireland. The object of the whole Bill is to stop the mouths of the tithe-payers, who have been indignant at not being compensated for the loss of their rents through the operation of the Land Acts. It is a sop to them, and the effect will be to reduce the tithe to which they are now liable by 25 per cent. The excuse for altering the standard is that, by the omission of its duty on the part of some Government Departments in Dublin, the Dublin Gazette failed to publish since 1887 statistics showing what the average price of wheat and corn had been, and because of that omission the Court had decided in Metge's case that as we have no standard to compare with now, the tithe must remain as it stood at the last previous revision. But a short Bill might have been brought in enabling the standard to be ascertained and set up—a similar standard to that provided in 1838, when the landlords of Ireland got 25 per cent. of their tithe rent-charge struck off which would otherwise have been payable to the parson. There was never such a confiscatory measure as this, because it unsettles that solemn compact by which 25 per cent. was given up by the poor parson for the purpose of having the 75 per cent. better secured. The landlords were glad to take that from the parson, and the receivers of tithe were content; but now they are not satisfied with that settlement made in 1838, and wish to rob the Church Fund to the extent of another 25 per cent.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): Order, order! I object to the Chief Secretary speaking to the Chairman. Let him leave the Chairman alone.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman is in charge of the Bill, and he is perfectly entitled to give me any explanation I may desire.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: Surely his explanations ought to be given in the face of the House. I cannot possibly address the Committee when these conferences are going on.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The right hon. Gentleman will see that it is impossible for me to get up and ask the Minister for the information I need.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: This is a very serious matter. I do not know whether any member of the Church of Ireland is present, but the Church was robbed of 25 per cent. of its income in 1838, and now what is represented as the Irish Church Surplus Fund is being further robbed of a similar amount. I daresay it is not pleasant to hear these statements made on the floor of the House; but I speak what I believe to be true, and I am utterly regardless whether I give satisfaction to any Member of the House or not. I know that Ireland was a scene of bloodshed, and not until the Tithe Composition Act was passed, over seventy years ago——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is really irrelevant in going back on the history of tithe, which has nothing to do with the Amendment now before the Committee.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: What I say is this: that no reason has been assigned for this Bill. We are not to pass every Bill that a Government, no matter how strong, brings in, at any rate without thorough discussion. There has been no public demand for this Bill, no agitation, no boycotting, no material reason for it. It is brought forward without any explanation or comment. The right hon. Gentleman does not condescend to tell the Committee why, instead of following the old Act and getting rid of some omission of duty on the part of some Department of the Government in Ireland, he substitutes a standard for revising the tithe rent-charge in the future, which will diminish the Church property by 25 per cent. Let the right hon. Gentleman get up and say that I am wrong in my calculations. He has not told us what the practical effect of this change will be on the Irish Church Surplus Fund, which was devoted by Act of Parliament "to the relief of unavoidable calamity and suffering" amongst the Irish people. He is bound, as a trustee of the State, before he violates that trust, to tell the House of Commons to what extent he is going to impair or encroach on that fund. Neither in his opening statement nor at any period of this debate has he intimated to the House what will be the effect on the Church Fund in pounds, shillings, and pence of this legislation. I think the House is entitled to that information. Some hon. Members may think that they are not. That is their concern, not mine. But it is a matter in which their constituencies are interested even more than mine, because the Imperial Exchequer must make good all the differences in the Irish Church Fund, upon the faith of which public money to the extent of nine or ten millions have been already advanced. So do not let hon. Members imagine that this is only an Irish question, and that they will not have to render an account of it to their own constituents.

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The right hon. Gentleman is again wandering from the question before the Committee. He must confine himself to the Amendment; otherwise I shall have very reluctantly to call his attention to the Order against irrelevancy.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: Of course, Mr. Lowther, I bow to your ruling; but I confess that, while I do so, it seems to me that it amounts to this: that all I can say is that the Amendment is better than the original clause, and therefore I vote for the Amendment.

*MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): The right hon. Gentleman says that, if this clause is carried, the tithe rent-charge will be reduced by 25 per cent. on account of the reduction in the judicial rents. I understand him to say that he would sooner go back to the old method of fixing the tithe rent-charge by the average corn prices. But if he did so, instead of reducing the tithe rent-charge by twenty-five per cent. it would reduce it thirty-three per cent.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: The rent-charge was not abolished by the Act of 1872 as to lay tithe. The lay tithe is exactly in the same position as before.

*MR. JEFFREYS: What I wish to point out is that the reduction of the tithe on the price of cereals is much greater than would be the reduction on the basis of judicial rents. At the present time in England every £100 of tithe is only worth £66 15s. 10d., while hon. Members will remember that in 1878 every £100 of tithe was worth £112, showing a fall since 1878 of 43 per cent. Therefore it would be much better to acquiesce in the terms of the Bill, to the reduction of the tithe according to judicial rents, than to corn averages. I have always myself thought it was very difficult to settle the tithe rent-charge on the average price of corn, because by Act of Parliament the prices have to be recorded in various towns and are not accurately taken. It would be much easier to fix the tithe rent-charge in the various localities according to the rents in those localities. It seems to me only fair and just that tithe should be reduced according as rents have been reduced. All these payments have to come out of the land, which must support three classes of people—the landlord, the tenant, and the labourer; and if the tithe is reduced, the better it will be for all; and if it benefits all three classes, surely every Irishman, whether landlord, or tenant, or labourer, should be in favour of the Bill. The hon. Member for Dundee rather expostulated with the Government for going on with this Bill as a flirtation with the landlords; and then he took occasion to find great fault with the Government for having reduced the rates on land in favour of the farmers. Surely if that was introduced into Ireland, everybody would agree that it would be a most excellent measure. Then he went on to say that the Government had relieved the landlords of some part of the land tax.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not in order in discussing speeches made on an Amendment on another clause which was disposed of yesterday.

*MR. JEFFREYS: I only wish I had been present last night. I trust that this relief to be given to the landlords of Ireland will meet with the approval of a great number of Irish and English and Scottish gentlemen. [HON. MEMBERS: Oh, oh!] Why not? It is a just reduction on account of the fall in price of cereals, and the fall in rents. On that account I shall warmly support this clause as a simple act of justice.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down is wrong a little bit. The reason why the Government adopt the standard in relation to judicial rents rather than in regard to the prices of corn, is that it will operate very much more largely in favour of the landlords, and by it the landlords will get a larger chunk out of the Church property. I can prove that out of the mouths of the landlords themselves. There was nothing which the landlords a short time ago insisted upon with greater force and persistency in regard to judicial rents than that these had been reduced out of all proportion to the fall in agricultural prices. I see the right hon. Gentleman who represented the landlords on the Fry Commission present, and he will remember that landlord after landlord, and agent after agent, was brought before that Commission to prove that the fall in agricultural prices had been very moderate indeed. That is the very reason why in this particular clause the Government have adopted a variation by judicial rents, and not by prices. Unquestionably there has been a reduction in the price of cereals, the largest being that of wheat, but it has not been great, if anything, in the case of butter and other dairy products and cattle. At the same time the landlords cannot have it both ways. Let them stand to one case or the other. If they are justified in contending that judicial rents have been reduced out of all fair proportion to the prices of agricultural produce, why not accept the Amendment and let that be the basis for fixing the tithe rent-charge? It has been said that the list of prices has not been published in the Dublin Gazette since 1887; but, as has been pointed out, it would be quite easy to rectify that. I would be very slow to accept prices taken by the Land Commissioners, but the authorities could readily obtain authentic data as to agricultural prices from 1887 to the present time, and that being done let them come to this House, if they are anxious to give a boon to their friends, and extract a large sum from the Irish Church Surplus Fund and hand it over to the landlords. Another reason why judicial rents should not be exclusively taken as a basis upon which the variation of the tithe rent-charge is fixed is that the reduction in the judicial rents is largely made up from the improvements made by the tenants themselves.

*THE CHAIRMAN: That question will be raised by the next Amendment.

MR. FLYNN: I do not want to anticipate an interesting Amendment, and I conclude by saying that there is no denying the fact that by fixing judicial rents as the basis of variation of tithe rent-charge the largest possible amount of money will be abstracted from the Irish Church Fund, which ought to be devoted to the general benefit of the whole Irish people, for the benefit of one class only.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): In regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Basingstoke, he may be thoroughly satisfied that if this Amendment were to give to the Irish landlords more money than the original clause in the Bill the Government would have accepted it at once. So far as I am concerned I do not look upon this matter as one of pounds, shillings, and pence, but as one of principle. Tithe in all the existing Irish, Scotch, and English Acts is based upon a footing of prices of agricultural produce. Now, why change that standard in Ireland? What principle is there for changing it? We are going to set up an unnatural basis, because tithe has nothing to do with rent, whether fixed judicially or by agreement. Tithe rent is a burden on the land, without any reference whatever to rent, or whether there is a tenant or not. There may not be a tenant at all. I cannot understand why the Government should set up a new basis altogether for fixing the tithe rent-charge, which has no warrant, no foundation, no application whatever to the facts of the case. The suggestion thrown across the floor of the House that the Amendment would give more to the Irish landlords than the original clause we may dismiss as a figment, otherwise the Chief Secretary would have jumped at it.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR rose in his place and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Sir Thomas Esmonde and
Captain Donelan.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL, who spoke seated and covered, desired on a point of order to call attention to the fact that if the Amendment were submitted in the form in which it had been put, it would exclude two subsequent Amendments standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Louth.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is quite right, but I put the question in that way in order to preserve the position of the hon. Member for East Mayo. I put the question two or three times and no objection was taken.

MR. DILLON: How could objection be taken when the closure had been moved?

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member for North Louth was not present when the Amendment was called, and the hon. Member for the Northern Division of Dublin County took charge of it, and moved it on his behalf.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: With all respect, if any hon. Member is not present in whose name the Amendment stands, it is competent for any hon. Member to move it.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I have repeatedly put the question to the House during the afternoon. If my attention had been drawn to the point when the question was first put I would have done my best to reserve the following Amendments, but we cannot go back now.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: With all respect——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I may also remind the hon. Member that the Committee has by its vote decided that the question which I have already proposed should be put; and therefore I could not amend the form of the question if I wished to do so.

Question put accordingly, "That the words proposed to be left out to the word 'and,' in page 2, line 4, stand part of the clause."

Captain Donelan.

MR. DILLON : The object of this sub-clause, as has already been pointed out, is to set up a totally new standard for the variation of the tithe rent-charge in Ireland, a standard differing entirely in principle from any system adopted either in England or Ireland, and I shall be able to show that unless my Amendment is accepted the standard proposed would be simply monstrous. It will be grotesque even if my Amendment be accepted, but it will be absolutely monstrous if it is not. But I must at the present time confine my remarks to the Amendment which I propose to submit. I propose for the old system of varying the tithe rent-charge an automatic system, which shall vary automatically in exact ratio to the variation of the official judicial rents. That is to say, if the judicial rent has been reduced during the last fifteen years 25 per cent., the tithe rent-charge in that district would be automatically reduced by 25 per cent. It is a notorious fact that reduction of judicial rents in Ireland is based mainly on a two-fold consideration, or two considerations quite distinct and apart from each other. Judicial rents may be reduced on account of the fall in the price of agricultural produce or, on the other hand, they may be reduced, and to a great extent are reduced, in consequence of the improvements made by the tenants. Now, could a more monstrous proposition be conceived than that the head rent, the tithe rent-charge of the landlord's property, should be reduced by the same amount as that by which he has been obliged to reduce the rent of a tenant owing to improvements which have been made by that tenant? I should have thought it could not have been supported by any member of this House. The landlord reduces his rent by 30 per cent. on account of the improvements of his tenant. The whole of it may be taken off, not because of any fall in the price of agricultural produce, but as an adequate allowance for the improvements of the tenant, and in respect of that allowance the landlord gets a reduction of 30 per cent. on his tithe rent-charge. I cannot understand why the Government should make such a proposal. The effect of my Amendment will be to remove this extraordinary anomaly. It will, if passed, leave a standard based on such reductions on agricultural rents as were found to be due to the fall in the prices of agricultural produce, and eliminate those reductions due to the improvements made by the tenants. This is an important point, because those of us who are acquainted with the conditions of Ireland know that the reduction in rents in great part was due admittedly to the improvements of the tenants. Therefore this clause would very seriously alter the standard by which the tithe rent-charge is collected. The whole scheme contained in Clause 2 of the new scheme, upon which these reductions are to be made, is grotesque, but if this Amendment is accepted it will modify to a great extent the injustice of the Bill. There are many other elements of injustice in this proposal, but I think I should confine myself to the one particular element dealt with by this Amendment. At present I do not propose to take up further time in moving this Amendment, and I shall wait with considerable curiosity to hear what are the views of the Government, and see what attitude they will adopt on this matter. I only know of one argument which can be used, and that I have no doubt will be used. They will talk about the calculations which will have to be entered into. I quite admit that it will necessitate considerable calculation, but that is not our fault, it is the fault of the Government; and when the Government bring in revolutionary proposals of this kind the responsibility for the mass of calculation which will be necessary to arrive at the reduction to be made must lie with the promoters of those proposals and not with us who are endeavouring to set the matter right. If the Government seek to base these reductions on that argument, some compromise may be arrived at, without going into minute calculations in each case, by leaving it to the Land Court to say how much or how little of the reduction on the judicial rent is due to tenants' improvements, and to strike out that from the amount of the tithe rent-charge, because it is due to the improvements which have been made by the tenants.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 4, after the word 'rents,' to insert the words 'deducting in each case, where a judicial rent has been fixed, the amount of the variation which was made in respect of improvements made by the tenants.'"—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said the acceptance of the Amendment was not only difficult but it was impossible, because, as a matter of fact, no record had been kept of the tenants' improvements before the year 1876, and therefore, in order to carry out the Amendment, it would be necessary to make special inquiry into every holding to ascertain what the tenants' improvements had been during the past twenty years. It must be perfectly clear to the hon. Member that, from the practical point of view, the Amendment was not one which could be accepted by the Government. No doubt the reductions in rent made by the Land Commissioners had been to some extent due to the fact that the Land Act allowed a reduction for tenants' improvements, but he would remind the Committee that tithe was originally calculated on produce, and the tenant who had to pay tithe would have had to pay on his improvements in so far as the produce of the land was dependent upon them. If the English system of variation were applied in Ireland, the proper reduction would be not 25 per cent., but something over 30 per cent., and if that system were to obtain in Ireland the tithe rent-charge, having regard to the price of wheat and oats, would be greatly increased. In the case of wheat it would be 50 or 60 per cent. and in the case of oats 60 or 70 per cent. He contended that the hon. Member had made out no case for the Amendment.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland) said that nobody would appreciate the revolutionary boldness of this measure without bearing in mind that the right hon. Gentleman had had the courage to attempt to change a system of taxation that was spoken of in Genesis, and which was already ancient when Moses came down from the Mount with the tables of the law. He would also remind the right hon. Gentleman that when he attended Divine service his attention was called to "the kindly fruits of the earth," but even that appeal to the antiquity of this tax had not been sufficient to keep him from this revolutionary proposal. Having dealt with the theological aspect of the case, he would now turn to the political consequences of the action of the right hon. Gentleman. The right hon. Gentleman answered the arguments of the hon. Member for East Mayo by saying that the improvements of the tenant should not be taken into consideration. Whilst listening to the right hon. Gentleman he wondered what might be the thoughts of the hon. Gentleman the Member for St. Stephen's Green—who accepted these proposals with such extravagant joy—upon the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman and the hon. Member for Basingstoke. It was perfectly well known that the prices of agricultural produce had fallen so little as to justify no reduction of rent at all. The right hon. Gentleman asked that the tithe rent should be reduced because the rents had been reduced, and that the tithe should be reduced in exact proportion to the reduction of the rent. Was there ever a more extraordinary collocation of absolutely irrelevant and unconnected circumstances? What connection was there between the reduction of rents and the reduction of tithes? The right hon. Gentleman proposed by the Bill to reduce the tithes in exact proportion to the reduction of rent. He was asked by the hon. Member for East Mayo to deduct from the reduction of rent those reductions which were made in consequence of the improvements of the tenants. Could anyone who looked at the subject with a fair and open mind, unbiassed by the prospect of boodle, suggest that that was not a fair request? Rents were not reduced owing to the fall in the price of commodities, but because the Land Courts held that they were bound to take from the rent the improvements made by the tenants. The reduction was made entirely irrespective of the landlord. The landlord had his rents reduced because he was taking and putting into his own pockets property which did not belong to him. It was held that the improvements belonged to the tenant and should not be charged in the rent but should be taken from it, and because legislation had restored to the pockets of the tenants the property which belonged to them, the landlord sought to take advantage of the restoration of that property and make that a reason for asking for a reduction of his tithes. If the right hon. Gentleman had said the tithes ought to be reduced because the amount on which they were collected was reduced the proposition would at least have been arguable, always providing that there was any justification for the reduction of tithes at all. But he held that there was no such justification. A tenant gets a bit of bog land and manures it. He and his fathers before him for thirty, forty, or even a hundred years, had by their labour, skill, and capital brought the bog into fertile action and the court came and said, "We will not charge you on the additional value you have given to this land and the improvements you have made," and now it was said that the landlord was to come to that House, and on the ground of his own wrong-doing make a claim for the reduction of his obligations. The proposition had only to be stated to show its grotesque absurdity. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman knew the absurdity and injustice of the Bill as well as anybody in the House. They could not defeat the principle of the clause, because already it has been accepted by the Committee, but at least they could try to mitigate its evils. It was absurd to make the reduction of tithe in any way proportionate to or dependent upon the reduction of rent. If they did establish that principle they should at least mitigate its operation by excluding from the reduction of tithe such a reduction in the rent as was due to the improvements of the tenant. The right hon. Gentleman said it was not a perfect measure. It was a rule-of-thumb measure. Surely it was very easy for the right hon. Gentleman to get another rough-and-ready method—that was all his hon. friend asked—by which these improvements would be excluded from the scale which entitled the landlord to a reduction on his tithe. The right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury, when Chief Secretary for Ireland, dealt with a point analogous to the one now before the House—namely, the sudden reduction in prices which made existing rents impossible. The right hon. Gentleman was able to pass through the House an automatic, rough-and-ready means by which the reduction of rent was made proportionate to the reduction in prices. In the same way the Chief Secretary, if he really had the will, could easily find the way of carrying out the proposal of his hon. friend. The request of the right hon. Gentleman that the landlords should have their burdens decreased was one of the most grotesque irrelevancies ever heard in that House.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid) said it appeared to him that the whole principle that underlay the Bill was to benefit the landlord at the expense of the tenant. The Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for East Mayo was one that ought to receive the assent of the House. If the tenant in days gone by had paid more rent than he ought to have done he did not see why the House should interfere in the way proposed to give the landlord the benefit of the improvements made by the tenant. The arrangement which the Bill proposed to set aside was entered into voluntarily. There was no compulsion put on the landlords to accept it. They thought they were entering into a very good arrangement. Now, after the lapse of a period of years, they came and sought to benefit at the expense of the tenants. That was an unfair proposal which the Committee certainly should not accept. If rents in former years were fixed on the improvements of the tenants, and were now fixed on the value of the land, that was a matter that should be taken into consideration. The tithe-rent should be fixed according to the reduction of the holding, exclusive of improvements. That was the whole point at issue.

MR. DILLON: I wish to say a few words in reply to the Chief Secretary before the Amendment goes to a division. The Chief Secretary in his speech made no attempt to justify his refusal to accept the Amendment. I knew the argument he would use would be that it would lead to a great deal of difficulty, and that it would be impracticable. I do not think it is impracticable. The reduction of a first charge on the land is a method which has never been applied in any country before, and it is of such an extraordinary character that I say it is our duty to fence round and safeguard the proposal so as to inflict the least possible amount of injustice. Let us for a moment see how this works out. Take the historical case of Adams v. Dunseath. In that case a man built a house on his holding. It was nearly double the value of the holding, and in the original trial under the Land Act, twenty years ago, the landlord was found to be entitled to put rent on the house built by the tenant. After fifteen or sixteen years the tenant in this case came into court again the other day, and owing to certain decisions in the final Court of Appeal he succeeded in getting all the rent paid on his house taken off, and he had it properly restored to him. A concrete case of this sort represents better than anything else the gross absurdity of the proposal in this Bill. Under this Bill, if you apply the principle now before us to the case of Adams v. Dunseath, the landlord would get a first charge on his estate reduced by 30, 40, or 50 per cent., whereas if he had never placed on the house the unjust rent which he has been compelled to forego he would not get the reduction. Can absurdity go further? It is quite true that that injustice was done by a rule of thumb system, but that does not affect the principle, and in order to illustrate the preposterous and grotesque nature of the principle on which this scale is to be based I am entitled to apply it to an individual case. I admit frankly that I have selected an extreme case. I do not mean to contend for a moment that the result of the Bill all over Ireland would be as extreme as it would be when applied to the case I have referred to, but the principle is equally rotten. Really I think it would be impossible to imagine a more monstrous proposition. When the right hon. Gentleman says the Amendment cannot be accepted—because, forsooth, it would give too much trouble to the Land Commission—he should devise another scheme. If he finds that he cannot by Amendments bring this scheme into consistency with logic, reason, and justice, then I say he is bound to throw away this scheme and propose another. We cannot dismiss from our minds the fact that this is one of the most extraordinary revolutions ever proposed in regard to the charges on land. What did the right hon. Gentleman say in his reply? He said I seemed to forget the real character of the variability inherent in tithe. What is variability in English tithe does not apply here, because it is no longer inherent in Irish tithe. It is a monstrous abuse of language to talk about variability being inherent in tithe, which thirty years ago was made the subject of statutory settlement in this House, the basis of which was that there should be no variability. What is variability? The right hon. Gentleman might easily have told the House that it was supposed to be a tenth of the produce—that is to say, the tithe varied in proportion to the value of the produce. Rents do not and ought not to vary in direct proportion to the rise and fall in prices. This I consider a most important point as bearing on this proposal, because I contend, and every agricultural expert whose works I have ever read on this subject contends, that rent, if justice is done, must vary in much greater proportion than the variation of price. That is an accepted axiom in dealing with these questions—that is to say, if the price of agricultural produce varies by 10 per cent., the rent ought to drop a great deal more. Rent pays, and ought to pay, in proportion to the cost of production, the price of labour and a variety of other considerations, but the variability inherent in tithe was based on a totally different standard. It was variability directly proportional to the price of produce. The right hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong when he refers me to the variability inherent in tithe, and he is doubly wrong when he leans on the hon. Member, who spoke in absolute sincerity, but in absolute ignorance of the history of Irish land, which is an extremely complicated subject. He thinks he can settle the question by telling us of the present condition of English tithes. He might as well tell us what is the position of tithe in China, if there is such a thing. That would have as much bearing on the position of tithe in Ireland as the speech of the right hon. Gentleman. Tithe in Ireland has been the subject of a series of arrangements. I am acquainted with the history of these settlements. I know that tithe in Ireland has been different throughout the whole century from what it has been in England, and to say that because variations take place in English tithes, similar variations ought to take place in Ireland, where a totally different system has been in force, where the land has been held for generations under a totally different system, is an utterly absurd and preposterous argument. You talk about the variability inherent in tithe. I maintain that, substantially speaking, there has been no variability inherent in Irish tithe since 1838. The right hon. Gentleman himself admitted that such was the variability since and before the settlement of 1838 that not one in a hundred ever succeeded in getting his tithe varied, and that for practical purposes that variability was invariable. The result was that for all practical purposes the tithe-payers in Ireland had settled down and accepted their tithe as an invariable charge on the land. It is absurd to base an argument in support of this revolutionary and extraordinary change on anything that existed in England. We have to deal with a case of tithe which for nearly one hundred years has been practically an invariable charge, so far as the ecclesiastical burden is concerned. The principle of inherent variability is invoked for the purpose of justifying this extraordinary proceeding, which really has no justification, and which is a frank and simple act of plunder.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I have been sitting here in expectation that we should really have some arguments adduced against the Amendment, but, so far as I understood, the Chief Secretary founded his opposition mainly on the assertion that it was practically impossible to draw the distinction which the Amendment implied. He did not, so far as I am aware, find out what would be the reduction of rent as based on tenants' improvements, but I did not understand that the right hon. Gentleman at all disputed the equity of the arguments used by the hon. Member for East Mayo. I confess to having been more or less in attendance while the Bill was being discussed, and I cannot help saying that it appears to me to be perhaps the most extraordinary measure of the session, if not of the Parliament or of the century. There was the initial puzzle why the Bill was introduced at all. Then there is the further puzzle why the funds to enable this obvious and naked gift to be made to the landowners of Ireland are to be taken from the Irish Church Fund, which was given by Parliament to the relief of the poor and needy, the distressed and suffering in Ireland. Then there was the puzzle of the mysterious printer's error which crept into two Acts of Parliament, and upon which the whole case appears to me to be founded. Then we have the puzzle that tithes which have been for many years fixed and stereotyped by the law of the land, and which before that we were told were practically fixed, so difficult was it to take the means to make them vary, are all the time inherently variable, and that such variability is of a sacred character and ought to be respected. The next puzzle is that tithes are no longer to have to do with the prices of produce, but with the reduction of rents, an element which had never come into the matter before. I have gone from one of these puzzles to another, and now I come to the last, that the reduction of rent, on the ground of which the landlord is to receive a benefit, is to include a reduction made in consequence of his having exacted a rent on his tenant's improvements. That was rent that he should never have had at all, and because he has been under the legislation, beneficent or otherwise, of recent years estopped from any longer exacting rent in this iniquitous fashion in a way that has been condemned by Parliament, he is to receive a pecuniary advantage now from this Bill. That is a chain of puzzles that I have never seen equalled in connection with an Act of Parliament before. In regard to the last proposal, I have waited expecting to hear some argument in its defence, and if there is no such thing to be said, why should we be stopped in preventing this gross injustice because there may be some difficulties in the way we have not heard of. It is an injustice in more senses than one, because it is in itself inequitable and illogical. Besides that, remember every penny that is taken out of the Irish Church Fund is taken from some other beneficent purpose, and there are hundreds of claims in Ireland which, I venture to say, ought to take precedence over the one with which we are now dealing.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The right hon. Gentleman stated that he had been in constant attendance.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: More or less. I was in attendance during the whole of the Second Reading debate, which gave me a certain knowledge of the subject.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I think it is rather a pity that the right hon. Gentleman did not address to the House on the occasion of the Second Reading of the Bill the observations he has just made, because the greater part of the observations are totally irrelevant to the Amendment now before us. I have already given the general grounds on which the provisions which the right hon. Gentleman attacks have been inserted in the Bill, and I am, therefore, content to address myself to the particular Amendment before the Committee. The hon. Member for East Mayo proposes that we should not take the reductions of rent as the standard of variation of tithes, and asks that an allowance should be made in each case for the improvements made by the tenants. My answer to that is that it would be absolutely impracticable. The thing could not be done, and I would say that the acceptance of the Amendment would ruin the whole Bill, and we might as well drop the Bill at ence. The hon. Member for East Mayo has stated that I said nothing whatever with respect to the justice of the proposal. What I stated previously was that I did not think the considerations of justice adduced by the hon. Member were such as to need that serious weight should be attached to them, and I have given my reasons for so thinking. I have also, over and above that, referred to the inherent variability of the tithes, and I would remind the hon. Member that tithe in its first form, in which it was really one-tenth of the produce, did and would include an amount due to the tithe-owner in consequence of greater productivity resulting from tenants' improvements, as well as the produce of the land apart from those improvements.

MR. DILLON: What about a house? There is no tithe on a house.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I think the reduction of rent has nothing to do with houses. But I would ask the Committee to look at the question a little more broadly. I have not said that tithe ought to be reduced because rents have been reduced, although I think I could quote speeches made by hon. Gentlemen opposite to that effect. What I said was that it was necessary to establish some standard of variability. There are strong objections, denied by nobody, to establishing the old standard of variability in Ireland, and we have therefore to introduce a new standard. I do not believe a fairer standard of variation could be devised than the one which we propose in this Bill. I have been told again and again that it is a revolutionary proposal, and that such a thing has never been heard of before. I think the principle, if I am not mistaken, was introduced into the Act of 1891, but in any case the general adoption of a principle of this kind has not been possible in any other country except Ireland, and in Ireland it is only possible from the circumstance that there we have had rents judicially fixed. We have taken advantage of that circumstance, and I venture to think that if the Bill passes there will be a better standard of variation for tithe rent-charge than there is in this country.

MR. FLYNN said it was quite evident, when the right hon. Gentleman could only make such a lame defence of the proposal, that there was no case. After all was said and done, the greater portion of the reduction was based on the tenants' improvements. They were bound to resist this Bill at every possible stage—firstly, because of its own inherent defects, and, secondly, because money was being taken from an Irish public source and given to one special class of the community. Up to 1881 the landlords of Ireland had a legal right to confiscate improvements, and to rob and penalise the tenants, and because, as the Leader of the Opposition had said, they were stopped from defrauding the tenants, they were now to get the largest possible share out of the Irish Church Fund. He hoped the House would protest against the action of the Government.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT NEWS.

On the Motion for Adjournment—

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.) asked if the Government had any information to give the House with regard to the state of affairs in China.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I am afraid that I have no satisfactory information to give to the House. The situation, so far as we know, is practically unchanged since yesterday, and the allied Admirals do not seem to have been able to take any forward movement towards Tientsin.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): Has there been any backward movement? A statement which appears in the press to-day conveys that impression.

*MR. BRODRICK: We have no reason to suppose that any backward movement has been made, but we have no information that they have yet seen their way to undertake any further movement forward.

Adjourned at ten minutes before Six of the clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

Thursday, 5th July, 1900.

ASHANTI—NATIVE RISING—INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, seeing the noble Earl the Under Secretary for the Colonies in his place, I should like to ask whether he can give the House any information with regard to the state of affairs on the West Coast of Africa.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (The Earl of SELBORNE): My Lords, Her Majesty's Government have received this morning the following telegram, which I am sure your Lordships will be glad to hear, from Colonel Willcocks—

"Fumsu, 4th July.—Just received letter sent by Governor Hodgson in which he states that he, with 600 native soldiers under the command of Major Morris, departed from Coomassie 23rd June by way of Patiasa (and) Terrabum. Captain Bishop, Inspector of Constabulary, Gold Coast, and Ralph, Lagos Constabulary, and 100 native soldiers have been left behind at Coomassie with rations up to 15th July. I will personally relieve Coomassie by the date under any circumstances. Hodgson states that intended to go over river Ofin by way of Mampong to Cape Coast—but I have applied to him by urgent special messengers to leave behind as many men as possible in order to give assistance to me enter into Coomassie. Lieutenant-Colonel Burroughs, with 400 native soldiers, arrived at Dompoasi 1st July."

I may add that that means he has got through the Dompoasi Hills, which are the most difficult part of the road to Coomassie. The telegram continues—

"Enemy's force taken completely by surprise; stockades evacuated by them. Burroughs captured forty guns, quantity of gunpowder and caps, and also killed thirty of the enemy; our loss one native soldier killed in action, three native soldiers wounded."

SAT FIRST.

THAMES AND SEVERN CANAL PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: My Lords, in moving the suspension of the Sessional Order of the 12th March with regard to the First Reading of Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, I will trouble your Lordships with a few words of explanation. I should not attempt to interfere with the operation of this Standing Order except upon good cause shown. I should at once agree that the onus of proving the necessity of suspending the Standing Order lies upon those who propose it, and I should not suggest that at this period of the session a Standing Order should be suspended for a Bill of this kind, unless the Department promoting it had every reason to believe that the Order would be unopposed. Important interests are involved in the Bill referred to, the object of which is to hand over to the County Council of the county of Gloucester a canal which is out of repair. The canal was authorised in the last century, but has fallen out of repair, and in 1893 the company owning the navigation published a notice of their intention to close it for through traffic. A large number of the local authorities concerned thought this would be disastrous to the community, and a trust was formed of several county councils and urban district councils to see if the undertaking could not be resuscitated. That trust have spent £15,000 upon this waterway, and have come to the end of their resources, but the County Council of Gloucester are anxious to avoid the abandoning of what they regard as an undertaking important to their district, and the object of this Provisional Order is to hand over the canal to that county council. No objections to the Order were received after many weeks of advertisement. Careful inspection has been undertaken at the hands of the officers of the Board of Trade, and the Law Officers of the Crown had to be consulted upon certain points. Under those circumstances a considerable amount of delay has taken place, but I assure your Lordships that it was unavoidable delay, for which neither the promoters nor the Board of Trade were responsible. The notice to suspend the Standing Order was put down in perfectly good faith, the Board of Trade believing that there would be no opposition. Since that time, however, an intimation of opposition has been handed to me. I do not know whether that intention is really to be carried into effect, or whether the gentleman giving the notice really proposes to petition against the Bill. If he intends to oppose it I would at once say that it would serve no useful purpose to proceed with the suspension of the Standing Order, but I should like to be quite sure that the oppposition is really intended before, on behalf of the County Council of Gloucester, I abandon what I know is earnestly desired by them and what I believe will be for the public interest. To put myself in order, I move the suspension of the Standing Order; but as to whether I shall persevere in the motion, I shall be largely guided by what is said in the House, and by the opinion of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, who has the best right to speak on this matter.

Moved, "That the Sessional Order of the 12th March last, 'That no Provisional Order Confirmation Bill originating in this House shall be read a first time after Tuesday, the first day of May next,' be dispensed with in respect of a Bill to confirm a Provisional Order made by the Board of Trade under Section 45 of the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888, in the matter of the Thames and Severn Canal."—(Lord Balfour of Burleigh.)

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I venture to hope that the House will hesitate before suspending the Standing Order in this case. I believe it will be generally admitted that it is undesirable to suspend the Sessional Order except where the object is a public one, and where it is quite clear that no private interests acquired by previous legislation or otherwise will be prejudicially affected or interfered with by reason of the Provisional Order. This, of course, professes to be and is a motion on the part of the Board of Trade for a Bill to confirm a Provisional Order, but in reality it is not for any public purpose. It is, as the noble Lord has himself told us, practically the Bill of the Gloucester County Council. What may be the intention or the proposals of the Gloucester County Council as contained in this Bill we do not know, because the Bill has not been published. It is not laid upon your Lordships' Table; and I must say, in passing, with regard to the procedure of the House, that I venture to think it would be a good thing if, when it is proposed to suspend a Standing Order in the case of any Provisional Order Bill, the Bill itself should be laid on the Table and circulated, so that your Lordships should have an opportunity of seeing what there is in the Bill.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: You cannot circulate a Bill until it has been read a first time.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Possibly that is a good objection; but I think that in these cases some effectual means ought to be taken in order to inform the House, and persons who may be interested, what object the Bill is intended to achieve. This Bill proposes to take a canal from a Trust to which it now belongs, and to make an Order for abandoning the canal, and, after that Order has been carried out, then to proceed to dispose of the canal otherwise. I am not interested at all in this canal, but after looking over the statements of the Board of Trade in promoting the Bill, and what the private individual has set out who is opposing it, I felt satisfied that it was a proper case to which to call your Lordships' attention. This private opponent opposed the Bill which was promoted by the Trust in 1895 and obtained certain terms, which were conceded to him by agreement. If this Bill goes forward it will conflict with the clauses of the Act of 1895, under which these terms were obtained. I can tell the noble Lord that the private opponent certainly does intend to oppose the Bill, and to persevere in his opposition. I was a little surprised when the noble Lord said that the Board of Trade had received no notice of opposition. I have had an opportunity of reading a long letter from the Parliamentary agent of the opponent, which was addressed to the Board of Trade, and which, though it did not contain the words "I object," recited the circumstances at very considerable length, and pointed out how objectionable such a proceeding as this on the part of the Board of Trade would be, and how it would injure his client. Under these circumstances I would appeal to the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees whether it is not proper that the usual course should be taken in this case. Why should the Gloucester County Council not proceed in the ordinary way? The Bill undoubtedly affects certain existing rights. It is, properly speaking, a private Bill, and why should it not be proceeded with in the ordinary way as a private Bill? I submit that this is not a proper case for the suspension of the Sessional Order, especially as the House is in entire ignorance of the contents of the Bill.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): My Lords, I take up very much the view of my noble friend behind me on this question. There is nothing irregular in the proposal being brought before your Lordships' House in the form of a Provisional Order; the irregularity consists in the Provisional Order being two months late, according to the Sessional Order of 12th March. I quite agree with what fell from my noble friend behind me, that the fault of the delay does not rest with the promoters nor with the Board of Trade, and I was quite prepared, from what I heard from the promoters, to make no objection to the Bill being introduced. But since hearing from the agent of the private individual who opposes the Bill that there is serious opposition, I venture to express the opinion that it is not a case where the Sessional Order should be dispensed with. We are now practically at the end of the first week in July. The Bill originates in this House, and if there is serious opposition it is impossible for it to be seriously considered. Under these circumstances it is hardly worth while suspending the Sessional Order in respect to this Bill.

*LORD BALFOUR OF BURLEIGH: After the expressions of opinion which we have heard I shall not persevere with my motion, but I should like to say that up till yesterday, so far as I can ascertain, no notice of opposition was lodged at the Board of Trade. I did receive a letter yesterday afternoon from the gentleman who I understand is to oppose the Bill, and on that I consulted with the Board of Trade. Under all the circumstances, although I greatly regret the necessity for postponing it, and although I believe the public interest will suffer, and that the damage to the waterway will be greater next year than it is this year, I have no option but to ask your Lordships to allow me to withdraw the motion.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

*THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Viscount CROSS): My Lords, in moving the Second Reading of this Bill I would remind your Lordships of the debates which took place in this House and elsewhere on the passing of the Workmen's Compensation Bill of 1897. That Bill introduced a novel principle in the matter of trade and business, making the business itself responsible for the risks of that business. Great apprehensions were entertained at the time that the Bill was going a good deal too far, and many persons, I believe, thought that such legislation would be a serious interference with trade and manufacture, and that great losses would be sustained by those engaged in such trades. There were other objections taken to the passing of that measure, not that it was too large, but that it was too small and did not include workmen in agriculture. The Government, whether rightly or wrongly—in my opinion rightly—said they would not include agriculture in the Bill of 1897 until time had elapsed, and they had been able to see whether the Bill would work well between employer and employed, and whether any serious mischief would arise from the passing of the Bill. Three years have elapsed since the Bill became law, and two things have happened. In the first place, although the Bill has very often been before courts of law in order that a legal interpretation might be obtained of that measure—which was no doubt complicated, and in some cases difficult of interpretation—the principle is now fully understood, and it is well known what the meaning of the Act really is. In the second place, those apprehensions which were conscientiously entertained as to the wisdom of passing the Bill and introducing this novel principle have really come to nothing. The Act has worked very smoothly and has been entirely satisfactory, I believe, to employers and employed. After three years experience of the Act of 1897 the Government are of opinion that it would be wise that the present Bill—which was introduced by a private Member in the other House, where it was thoroughly discussed, and which has for its object the extension of the Act to agricultural labourers, whose exclusion in 1897 was the subject of much comment—should be passed into law this session. I should like to say one word with regard to the first clause. The Bill as originally introduced was simply to extend the provisions of the Act of 1897 to agriculture entirely. It was felt in the discussions in the other House, and I believe outside, that there should be some limitation as to the extent to which the Bill should go. That matter was most carefully discussed and the clause amended, it being felt that if there was no limitation in the case of small farmers, who might simply have an allotment and employ casual labourers, great hardship might be done, such farmers probably being in no better financial position than the casual labourers whom they employed. The first section of Clause 1 was altered, and now reads as follows—

"From and after the commencement of this Act, the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, shall apply to the employment of workmen in agriculture by any employer who habitually employs one or more workmen in such employments."

That was to exclude very small men, and to include every bonâ fide farmer. The best words to secure this object which could be found in the other House were those embodied in the Bill. I hope your Lordships will accept the Bill as it has come up to us and pass it into law in the course of the present session. During the discussion elsewhere there were two or three other points raised which had not been foreseen by the private Member who introduced the Bill. In many cases farmers pay by piece work and not by day work, and in order to meet such cases the following section was introduced—

"Where any such employer agrees with a contractor for the execution by or under that contractor of any work in agriculture Section 4 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, shall apply in respect of any workman employed in such work, as if that employer were an undertaker within the meaning of that Act."

On large farms a great deal of the work is done by a contractor who brings with him machinery for the purpose of threshing and ploughing, and it was thought that it would be very hard on the farmer if he had to pay damages to workmen employed by this contractor, who ought to be himself responsible for the safety of his own men. Therefore, the following clause has also been introduced—

"Provided that where the contractor provides and uses machinery for the purpose of threshing, ploughing, or other agricultural work, he, and he alone, shall be liable under this Act to pay compensation to any workman employed by him on such work."

That would not relieve the farmer to any extent so far as his own men were concerned, but it would relieve him of responsibility for any injury to the servants of his contractor. I do not think I need trouble your Lordships by referring to any of the other matters in the Bill. I will content myself by expressing the opinion that it will be of very great advantage to agricultural interests generally, and I trust that your Lordships will read it a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Viscount Cross.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I have certainly no objection to the principle of this Bill. I never could understand, and do not now, after the explanation of the noble Viscount, why the Government thought proper in the preceding Bill to exclude the industry of agriculture, and I am rather surprised to hear the argument which appears to be now used in favour of that course having been taken. The application to artisans only seems to be supported on the principle of fiat experimentum in corpore vili. That seems to be rather remarkable. I should have thought that the artisans were so important a class that it was not upon them that you should try experiments. I congratulate the noble Viscount on the extraordinarily rosy view which he takes of the working of the Workmen's Compensation Act. The principle of it seems to be generally recognised as good, but I have been myself under the delusion—as I suppose I must call it—that there was very wide discontent with the framing of that Act, that very great difficulty had occurred in applying its machinery, and it was said to be in great part unintelligible, making frequent application to courts of law necessary. I am sure the opinion expressed by the noble Lord as to the smoothness of the operation of the Act cannot be shared generally by those who have paid attention to what has been passing in the Courts. The noble Viscount is persuaded that all the questions which arose under that Act have now been so completely settled that there is no probability of further difficulty. I have no information to lead me to contest that statement, but it certainly seems to me to be a rather sanguine view to entertain. I shall not trouble the House with any remarks with regard to the limitations of the Bill. It may possibly be that these limitations may be necessary, but I should like to ask the noble Viscount for some explanation of two of the sections to which he referred. I understood the noble Viscount to say that the second section of Clause 1 was inserted in order to meet the very common practice of a labourer undertaking work by piecework. I confess that it rather puzzled me, when I saw the clause, to find that a man who undertakes the very ordinary operation of agriculture by piecework is a contractor. If that is the proper legal term I have nothing more to say, but I should like to see a word used which would be more intelligent to the ordinary reader. I am certain there is no farmer in this country who would imagine that a man he employed to hoe turnips at so much an acre was a contractor. I hope the section is perfectly sound in law. I am not a lawyer, but I should think that applications to the Court to interpret the word "contractor" will be far from improbable. With regard to the machinery of the Bill I have nothing to say. I think it is rather surprising that this Bill was left to a private Member to bring forward. I should have thought the Government, having made up their minds that after three years working of the Act of 1897 it was safe to apply it to agricultural labourers, would themselves have brought in a Bill. I do not want to make this a matter of party at all; but certainly the agricultural labourer will have no reason to thank the Government for having passed this Bill.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, I do not rise to offer any opposition to this Bill. On the contrary, I approve of its provisions, and I have never been able to see why agricultural labourers were not as much entitled to be included in the Act of 1897 as any artisan or labourer of any other kind. I have only one remark to make. I wish to call the noble Viscount's attention to Sub-section 2 of Clause 1, to which the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition has just alluded. That section says that Section 4 of the Act of 1897 shall apply with a certain proviso. I hope the provision for indemnity contained in Clause 4 of the Act of 1897 will also be inserted in the present Act, and I would submit this point in the hope that the noble Viscount will consider it between now and the Committee stage.

*LORD WINDSOR: My Lords, I should like to express my satisfaction that Her Majesty's Government have taken up this Bill, and thereby practically ensured its passing into law this session. I do not think that anybody suggested during the debates in this House in 1897 that the Workmen's Compensation Bill of that year was applicable only to those trades which were particularly dealt with by that Bill. I think it is not an unfair thing to say that the extension of the Bill to agricultural labourers was the expectation of those who supported it, and the warning of those who objected to it. There were one or two Members of your Lordships' House who did object to the Bill. The noble Marquess who is now Postmaster General said that nobody had asked for it. However true that may have been at the time, I think there is no doubt that the agricultural labourers now take a very decided interest in this Bill, and desire that it should be passed. On the few occasions on which I have addressed audiences partly composed of agricultural labourers during the past year, I have found that next to the war in South Africa this is the only question which really seems to rouse interest in them. If it is admitted that the principle should be extended to agricultural labourers, the only point is whether it can be done so that no undue hardship or burden is placed upon the employers of agricultural labour. It seems to me that that becomes a question of insurance, and I do not think anybody can say that the terms which are now offered by insurance companies for the insurance of agricultural labourers would place any severe burden on the employers. I understand that certain insurance companies are willing to insure for 3s. per £100 of wages paid, and, though there is a limit of 5s., below which amount the companies will not insure, the very small employers of labour can get out of that by combination. In that way I venture to think that no real hardship will fall upon small employers of labour. Those connected in any way with the land know that one of the difficulties farmers have to contend with is that of obtaining labour at particular times of the year. I do not suggest that the absence during the past three years of the protection of this Compensation Act has been the cause of the difficulty of getting labour, but I do say that a disparity and disadvantage of this kind will make it still more difficult for farmers to obtain labour, and give workmen a still greater inducement to go to the towns. I think it is of the greatest importance that the benefits of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897 should be extended to workmen in agriculture as speedily as possible, and I wish again to express my satisfaction that the Government have taken the Bill up, and that there is some chance of its passing into law.

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, I am glad that Her Majesty's Government have got this Bill so far safely on its way, and that there is a good possibility of a measure becoming law this session which will help to keep labourers on the land. The noble Earl behind me, the Leader of the Opposition, expressed himself as rather afraid of litigation arising, but under the system of insurance which has lately been advertised and set on foot there will be no such risk, because insurance companies will compensate in all cases without the necessity of litigation. Last year I insured all my labourers in Cheshire, and this year I have done the same in Anglesey, and between those two occasions the rates have been lowered from 3s. 6d. to 3s. 3d. or 3s.—I am not quite sure which, but there has been a considerable reduction. The only case where it might possibly press hard would be that of the small farmer, but he must hope that good luck will prevent him having any serious accident.

*VISCOUNT CROSS: Far be it from me to say that the ingenuity of the lawyers would not enable them to raise fresh points on the Act of 1897. What I meant to say was that the more prominent points have already been decided, so that the Act is much more intelligible now than it was when passed. With regard to what fell from the noble Earl below the gangway, I cannot say that subsection 2 of Clause 1 is in the best form in which it could be put, and I will take care that the observation he has made shall be considered by the lawyers, and if it can be improved in form I will see that some amendment is made at a later stage. That the Act of 1897 has on the whole worked satisfactorily, and that the evils which were apprehended have not proved real, is shown by the fact that the insurance companies are asking much lower rates than were asked at first. If we want any proof that the Act is working satisfactorily we have it by the action of the insurance companies.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2ª accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL

[THIRD READING.]

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a third time."—(The Earl of Selborne.)

LORD STANMORE: My Lords, before this Bill is read a third time and passes finally from the cognisance of this House, I should like to ask for an explanation from Her Majesty's Government of some of the terms employed in the fifty-first section in regard to the subjects with which the Commonwealth Parliament is empowered to deal. Those subjects are very numerous, and for the most part require very little explanation, but there are one or two points about which I think it is only right that your Lordships should receive some information as to the meaning attached to the words, on the one hand by Her Majesty's Government, and on the other hand by the Governments of the Australian Colonies. I wish, first of all, to call attention to the words "external affairs." How are these words to be interpreted? They may be interpreted in a vastly extended sense or in a very restricted one. I wish to know what interpretation Her Majesty's Government place on them and what interpretation the Governments of the Australian Colonies put upon them. Do these words mean that the Legislature of the Commonwealth may, if they like, appoint consuls and diplomatic agents in different parts of the world? It would be satisfactory to know to what extent the external affairs of the colonies are to be placed under the control of the Legislature and Government of the Commonwealth, because it may be held by some to be a power which I do not think your Lordships intend to confer. This is not altogether a speculative question, because I remember very well many years ago, when I was more conversant with the opinions of Australian statesmen than I can now boast of being, there were many very distinguished Australian public men who held that it was the right of the colonies that they should conduct their own external affairs, and who were eager to attain that object, and I do not believe that that wish has altogether died out. The next item is also one with regard to which I think some explanation would at least be acceptable—I do not say it is absolutely necessary. Under that clause the Commonwealth Parliament are also enabled to legislate with regard to "The relations of the Commonwealth with the islands of the Pacific." These are very large words. There are many classes of islands—islands which either belong to or are more or less under the influence of Great Britain, islands which are independent, islands which are the property of foreign Powers, and one group of islands which form a separate British colony. Is it intended that the Commonwealth is to have power to legislate with regard to all these islands? I presume not. No one would suggest that the Commonwealth Parliament should have power to legislate with regard to the relations existing between the Australian colonies and those islands of the Pacific which are the property of foreign nations. It is desirable that we should not be committed to vague words which may mean many things, and in connection with which questions may be raised to the great inconvenience of administration. The Commonwealth Parliament is also empowered to legislate as to "Fisheries in Australian waters beyond territorial limits." I confess I do not understand how they can have jurisdiction beyond the territorial limits, because the waters beyond those limits form part of the high seas. I cannot sit down without expressing that fervent hope, which I am sure everyone who has had any connection with the Australian colonies must feel from the bottom of his heart, that this great measure may be one attended with all the success and lead to all the benefits which its authors have anticipated.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, the noble Lord who has just addressed you must remember, if he kindly will, what the scheme of Sub-section 51 is. It is a scheme to confer upon the Commonwealth Parliament a concurrent right of legislation with the Legislatures of the Australian States, and I am advised that "external affairs" in this connection mean neither more nor less than the right of dealing with that which has hitherto been dealt with by the Australian Colonies, which in future will become the Australian States. It is certainly not intended by the authors of this Bill that these words should be stretched so as to invest Australia with the paraphernalia of consuls and ambassadors separate from the British Empire. As regards the question of the relations of the Commonwealth with the Islands of the Pacific, those words are imported directly from the Federal Council of Australia Act, 1885. It is a simple transfer of the jurisdiction conferred in that Act upon the Federal Council to the Commonwealth Parliament. Section 15 of that Act began as follows—

"Saving Her Majesty's prerogative, and subject to the provisions herein contained, with respect to the operation of this Act, the Council shall have legislative authority in respect of the several matters following."

The first matter was the relations of Australasia with the Islands of the Pacific. That is a mere transfer from one Act to the other, and the spirit in which it has been introduced and is intended to be worked by the authors of this Bill is the same as that which animated the authors of the Federal Council Act. I do not think it would be possible to lay down a strict rule beforehand as to the exact scope of this provision, but I do not think there is any more reason to suppose that this sub-section will be abused than there was danger that the Federal Council would abuse the powers conferred upon them. Before I sit down I should like to refer very briefly to one or two points that arose in the Debate on the Second Reading in connection with Clause 74. The noble Lord who followed me in the debate (Earl Carrington) will pardon me for saying that he seemed completely unaware of the doubts and difficulties which had arisen over the original wording of Clause 74. He seemed to be absolutely at sea as to the questions which were really discussed by the delegates and Her Majesty's Government, and I do not think he at all apprehended that in the attitude he was taking up he was putting himself in a position of opposition to the prevailing Australian public opinion. There were several objections to the clause apart from the points specially emphasised by Mr. Chamberlain in another place. One objection was that the interpretation of the clause was, at any rate, doubtful. If your Lordships refer to page 17 of Blue-book 158, which contains copies of the Memoranda furnished to Her Majesty's Government by the Australian delegates, you will see that it is asserted that the clause as brought to this country did not in any way impinge on the right of appeal to the Privy Council, except in a limited number of constitutional cases; but that was merely a question of opinion. It was open to argument that the right of appeal from the State Courts was abrogated altogether, and it was also open to argument that it was only abrogated in cases in which the Constitution might be supposed to be affected. It is not for me, being a layman, to give any opinion as to which of these views was the wisest or most sound. I only mention them to show that there was a real doubt as to the meaning of the clause as brought to this country, and, whatever may be thought of the ultimate shape the clause has assumed, your Lordships must admit that the right of appeal is reserved in all cases, and that the only question is whether it was wise or unwise to leave it to the High Court of Australia to decide whether in a certain class of cases an appeal should lie. I was asked very pointedly why the provision which appeared in the original clause, "unless the public interests of some part of Her Majesty's dominions other than the Commonwealth or State are involved," was omitted from the clause as it stands at present. The reason is that it did not seem to Her Majesty's Government, in consultation with the delegates, that the words were any longer necessary, because any such case can now be taken direct to the Privy Council from the Supreme Court of a State, or, if it goes to the High Court of the Australian Commonwealth, it can be taken to the Privy Council by leave of the High Court, and Her Majesty's Government have absolute confidence in the discretion of the High Court. Great stress was laid upon the point that it might be held in the future that the High Court was a co-ordinate court with the Privy Council so far as the interpretation of the Constitution in a particular class of cases was concerned, and some doubt was felt as to the accuracy of my statement that there were precedents in the judicature of this country for allowing an inferior court to be the deciding authority as to whether there should be an appeal to a higher court. I find in the Judicature Act of 1873 that—

"All appeals from Petty or Quarter Sessions, from a County Court, or from any other inferior Court, which might before the passing of this Act have been brought to any Court or Judge whose jurisdiction is by this Act transferred to the High Court, may be heard and determined by Divisional Courts of the High Court, consisting respectively of such of the Judges thereof as may from time to time be assigned for that purpose, pursuant to the rules of Court, or (subject to rules of Court) as may be so assigned according to arrangements made for the purpose by the Judges of the High Court. The determination of such appeals respectively by such Divisional Courts shall be final unless special leave to appeal from the same to the Court of Appeal shall be given by the Divisional Court by which any such appeal from an inferior Court shall have been heard."

That was a direct case in which the leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal was to be given by the lower or inferior Court. That enactment remained in force for, I believe, something like twenty years, when an Amendment was introduced by which the leave to appeal to the Court of Appeal may be given by the Court of Appeal as well as by the inferior Court. There is another precedent in questions of bankruptcy—and in this matter there has been no change in the law—in which an appeal lies to the House of Lords on the leave of the Court of Appeal. It is not the House of Lords which gives the leave to appeal, but the Court of Appeal. In neither of these cases has the inferior Court been held to be co-ordinate with the Court above it. The Lord Chief Justice, in arguing this question, laid great stress on the words "final and conclusive." I have carefully looked up what the noble and learned Lord said, as reported in The Times, and I think I am not misrepresenting him when I say that his argument was to the effect that there could be no doubt that the Privy Council would, in all matters including the interpretation of this Act, be held to be the final authority, except in that limited class of cases defined in Clause 74, in which leave to appeal to the Privy Council is left to the discretion of the High Court. In that class of cases, and in that class of cases alone, the noble and learned Lord said he had a fear that it might be held that the High Court of Australia was a co-ordinate court with the Privy Council. The Lord Chief Justice, if he will pardon me for saying so, was speaking without having the exact words of the clause in his hand, because the words "final and conclusive" do not appear in that particular clause, but in the previous clause, in relation not to those special points on which the High Court is to give leave to appeal, but to the much larger class of cases in which the Lord Chief Justice himself admitted that there could be no doubt that the authority of the Privy Council would be supreme. Therefore, whether his contention was right or wrong, he cannot rest it on the insertion of the words "final and conclusive," because they do not appear at all in the clause to which he was referring. I have been rather rash, as a layman, in mentioning these points, but I could not pass over in silence arguments which I venture to think were faulty. I cannot see how it can possibly be contended that there can be any superior judicial authority in Her Majesty's Dominions than Her Majesty herself, the fount of all justice; and I am advised—and as a humble student of history I have always understood—that the decision of the Privy Council is the most direct form of expression of the judicial authority of the Crown, and that there is no precedent in the history of the judges of our race for setting up the authority of any Court deriving its judicial functions from Her Majesty over that direct expression of Her Majesty's own opinion which is to be found in the decisions of the Privy Council. This is the final stage of this great measure in your Lordships' House. What the future has in store for Australia few of us will venture to measure; but perhaps we can exercise our imagination, and try to judge what the future of Australia will be by endeavouring to conjecture how different would have been the development of the thirteen petty American States if they had not become the great United States of America; and I am sure your Lordships will join with me, re-echoing that watchword of Australia, "Advance, Australia," in the hope that Australia united will, with Canada, and, I hope, in the not far distant future, with South Africa, be a partner with the United Kingdom in the great work that lies before it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, it would have been more satisfactory if the noble and learned Lords who usually sit behind me had been present when the noble Earl thought fit to make this statement in answer to what was said by them on the Second Reading of the Bill, but unfortunately they are not here. I can assure the noble Earl that there is a very strong feeling on this side of the House, and I believe among many people, that the Bill as it is now framed is not only not an improvement on the point of the appeal to the Privy Council, but is distinctly less satisfactory, than the Bill as it originally stood. In the original Bill Clause 74 declared that no appeal should be permitted to the Privy Council in any matter involving the interpretation of the Constitution, unless the public interests of some part of Her Majesty's dominions, other than the Commonwealth of Australia, were involved. It appeared to many of us, and certainly to me, that the provision which was introduced in the original Bill by the Australians was animated by a desire to guard to the utmost possible extent against any interference by the Australian Commonwealth in matters of public interest outside Australia itself. To the ordinary man that appears to be a far better safeguard than what is now in the Bill. You have said that no appeal in certain cases should be allowed unless that appeal is permitted by the High Court itself. I have, of course, like all your Lordships, perfect confidence in the integrity and knowledge of the learned judges who will constitute the High Court of Australia, but anyone, I think, who knows what human beings are cannot but see that any tribunal which is appointed for the ordinary administration of justice stands in quite a different position when they themselves are to be the judges as to whether or not there should be an appeal in matters affecting their own court. I cannot conceive any task more difficult or invidious to fulfil. I can easily imagine that in certain cases there may arise a feeling of dissatisfaction with the decision of the Court, and that people may say the appeal ought to have been allowed. That seems to me a point of great importance. I am obliged to say that I have neither seen nor heard any answer to the arguments of my noble friends the Lord Chief Justice and Lord Davey; and many of us who have paid what attention we could to this Bill are still lost in astonishment that there should ever have been raised this controversy with the Australian colonies. In my belief it would have been far better, safer, and wiser to have accepted the Bill as it stood. I would not have blamed Her Majesty's Government for taking care that the right of appeal was fully preserved. That was a matter of so high importance that it was a very fair subject for consideration; but, if they had considered it from the point of view that they should have done, they would have found there was no necessity for raising the controversy. Although the controversy is now, happily, ended—and we all know that the result is acceptable to the Australian colonies—yet there was a moment when there was very serious apprehension lest there might be difficulties raised in Australia which might possibly wreck the whole scheme. I again repeat that I do not understand for what possible reasons this controversy was raised. The only explanation we can invent may possibly be ill-founded—it is that the first intention of those who objected to the Bill as it stood was to preserve the right of appeal altogether intact. It was found that that raised a very serious and very great difficulty as regards the colonies themselves. Then we saw with astonishment the Colonial Secretary appealing to newspapers in the colonies against the opinion of the Colonial Governments and the whole Australian people—one of the most imprudent and objectionable things I have ever known done by a responsible Minister of the Crown in a matter of this importance.

THE EARL OF SELBORNE: The noble Earl has forgotten that the Governments thanked the right hon. Gentleman for what he had done.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Then they were thankful for small mercies. It was a matter of great relief to them that he had come back to something they could accept. When it was found that the original course intended was impossible, it became necessary to find some way out which might save the credit of the Minister who had charge of the matter. I admit and admire the ingenuity with which it was done. The first attempt, which was communicated to the House of Commons, and was stated to be entirely satisfactory, broke down altogether, and then, at last, very ingeniously, and, I think, with wisdom, what is called a compromise was hit upon. I say it was ingenious. It was ingenious to find out such a contrivance, and it was wise, because it turned out to be something the Australian colonies could accept. But the conduct of the matter was not such as to excite any very great admiration. I am very glad the Bill has arrived at this the last stage, and I assure your Lordships I would not have referred to the controversy at all if the noble Earl the Under Secretary for the Colonies had not seen fit to comment upon it.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I do not share with the noble Earl the opinion that Clause 74 as it originally stood was better than it has since been made. I may, perhaps, venture to suggest to the noble Earl that if he had had to construe as a judge the words "public interest in some other part of Her Majesty's dominions," he would have found considerable difficulty. I myself took great exception to the phrase, and, again, with reference to what he calls an invidious course—that of calling upon a court to say whether there should be an appeal from it or not—I would ask the noble Earl whether he has not heard of such a provision before. There is hardly a court in the country in which exactly that provision does not exist. It exists in courts of quarter sessions, in courts of summary jurisdiction, in courts of first instance, and in courts of appeal. Those courts have from time to time exercised the very discretion contemplated here. It may be true that on some occasions people have said, "Oh, that Court was wrong; it ought to have allowed an appeal"; but on the whole the discretion is supposed to be exercised wisely and impartially. The question of the true construction of the Act, which was raised on the Second Reading by the Lord Chief Justice and Lord Davey, is one upon which any intelligent laymen is as well able to form an opinion as a lawyer. The point, apparently, is that there are some matters reserved for the Court in Australia, and reserved in the sense that its decision is final. So far as that particular case is concerned, of course the fact of the reservation by the statute prevents the particular case ever being brought up again anywhere else. That is perfectly true. But the important question which was suggested was that if the Court in Australia gave a different decision from some decision in this country—not in a particular case, because, of course, that could not arise, but in some equivalent case—it might be said that there was no authority in the Supreme Court of this country to overrule, in the sense of saying that was not the law. I think in making this statement the noble Lords have not sufficiently considered this point. The Supreme Court must ultimately declare the law, and that law must be final in all courts.

*LORD MORRIS: I was unable on the Second Reading, owing to illness, to take part in the discussion on this Bill, but I should not like it to pass without making a few observations upon it. I regret extremely that Clause 74 was ever introduced into the Bill, and, having been introduced, that it was not deleted. I heard the speech of the Colonial Secretary in the House of Commons, and I was convinced in my own mind of the absolute danger of meddling at all with the appeal to the Queen. The noble Earl opposite has asked why this clause was not struck out. He ought to have a very good opportunity of supplying the answer, which is an obvious one. It is, that immediately the Colonial Secretary suggested that Clause 74 should be deleted—which in my humble opinion would have been the best course for the Australians themselves, and which was manifestly in accordance with the opinion of the greater part of, if not the entire, judiciary and Bar of Australia, and of all the persons who understood the subject—the Leader in the House of Commons of the party which the noble Earl opposite represents in this House attempted to make party capital out of the suggestion by saying that the Colonial Secretary had flouted the Australians. That the course which the Colonial Secretary took was the proper course in the opinion of experts that right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to prove by referring to general sources of information, such as newspapers, etc., which I have often heard quoted as sources of information open to everybody, although it has been suggested this evening by the noble Earl that it was unworthy and unbecoming to refer to them. The proposal to get rid of Clause 74, and to leave the right to appeal to Her Majesty in Council to every subject of Her Majesty who thought he was injured in person or property, was called flouting the Australians, and it was quite obvious to me that, if the clause had been struck out, "Who flouted the Australians?" would have been raised as a party cry. A change was forced upon the Colonial Secretary by the position taken by the Leader of the Opposition in the House of Commons, and which the rank and file of his party appeared quite ready to follow up. I regret extremely that the clause was not left out, and the right of appeal in Australia allowed to stand on the same footing as the right of appeal in Canada. It has been said that it is a novel thing for an inferior court to have the power of giving leave to appeal to a superior court. In the case of landed property in Ireland it is not considered so extraordinary that there should be no appeal from the Land Commission Court without their own leave. I join heartily in the chorus of admiration which has found expression among all parties in regard to this Bill.

*Lord ALVERSTONE: My Lords, I would crave your Lordships' indulgence for a few moments while I express my opinion on the point raised by the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition. I am one of those who would have been most anxious to preserve the original right of appeal; not so much in the interests of the United Kingdom as in the interests of the colonies of Australia themselves. I have had personal experience of the great value the right of appeal was to Canada, and I know that grave political questions, which excited great public attention, were disposed of by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in a way which was satisfactory to all. But that is not the issue now raised. The noble Earl has given the great weight of his opinion, which I very much regret, to the view that the form in which the Bill was brought to this country by the Australian delegates was better than the form in which it now stands. I happen myself to have taken part in all the preliminary discussions in regard to the Bill, and I would ask your Lordships to permit me to present one or two arguments which, I think, should satisfy independent minds that the view presented by the noble Earl is not right. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has already referred to the difficulty of construing the clause as it originally came to this country, but that was not the way in which the difficulty was presented to those of us who had to do with the negotiations. It was practically admitted by those who were at that time arguing for the possibility of retaining the clause that an appeal might be debarred in the case of most important interests, such as those of great shipping companies. It was conceded by those with whom we discussed the matter that such important interests would not fall within the words, "the public interest of some part of Her Majesty's dominions." Very grave doubt also was felt whether or not the appeal from the Colonial Courts, as well as from the High Court of the Commonwealth, was interfered with. The Colonial Secretary and those associated with him accordingly endeavoured to induce the delegates to agree to Clause 74 being cut out altogether. I am aware that we were not able to attain the full object we had in view, but the noble Earl has expressed the opinion that the clause as it now stands is less advantageous. The analogy of Canada has been quoted, but there is a marked difference. In Canada the rights of legislation between the Dominion and the provinces were carefully defined by sections in the North American Act, but under this Bill there will be to a certain extent co-equal powers between the States and the Commonwealth. Therefore there was a substantial ground for asking—if a question does arise between the Commonwealth and the State as to the powers of the respective Legislatures—is not that a matter which you could safely leave to the High Court to deal with? Accordingly the words were agreed to that—

"No appeal shall be permitted to the Queen in Council from a decision of the High Court upon any question howsoever arising as to the limits inter se of the Constitutional powers of the Commonwealth and those of any State or States or as to the limits inter se of the Constitutional powers of any two or more States, unless the High Court shall certify that the question is one which ought to be determined by Her Majesty in Council."

That was a concession made to the feeling of Australia, and if I take that by itself I do not think the noble Earl would be able to say that it is not far preferable to leave the right of appeal standing generally, and to limit the express and particular point which was to be left to the High Court. One leaves the right of appeal standing, with an exception which is actually expressed in the Bill; the other would have made it necessary, in order to allow an appeal to be brought, to satisfy that extraordinary provision, "the public interest of some part of Her Majesty's Dominions." An advantage having, I would humbly submit, been gained by preserving the right of appeal and by limiting the particular questions which might be dealt with by the High Court of the Commonwealth, we have to consider whether there is anything in a subsequent part of the clause which in any way deprives the subjects of the Queen of the advantage, which I trust I have demonstrated, the Bill in its altered form gives them. The next paragraph in the clause provides that—

"The High Court may so certify, if satisfied, that for any special reason the certificate should be granted and thereupon an appeal shall lie to Her Majesty in Council on the question without further leave."

In the interest of Australia I should have been glad to see the colonies and the Commonwealth, or persons interested in questions that may arise between them, free to appeal to the Privy Council—and I hope that view may still find weight with the Australian Commonwealth — for in times of great political excitement this is especially valuable that leave to appeal to the Privy Council may be given; and I do not doubt that when great political questions arise every member of the High Court will feel it his duty to accept the guidance of this impartial tribunal, which can be relied upon to decide the questions free from any bias or political agitation. It is said that you impair the dignity of the Privy Council and run some risk of its decisions not being followed, because leave is given in this particular case to appeal. I share with the noble and learned Lord the Lord Chancellor a feeling of astonishment that such views should have been placed before your Lordships as were put forward by the Lord Chief Justice and Lord Davey. I regret I was not here on the Second Reading of the Bill, and I am sorry that the noble and learned Lords are not in their places to-day. Appeals have been given by inferior Courts to higher Courts in the circumstances mentioned by the Lord Chancellor and others, and I have never yet heard it suggested that the Court which had given the leave afterwards felt itself justified in declining to obey the rule of law laid down by the Court to which it had given leave to appeal. Lord Davey, I understand, suggested that there would be two sorts of Courts of Appeal in which the Jurisdiction would appear to be co-ordinate. I venture respectfully to suggest that the experience of the world is contrary to that view, and I do not hesitate to say that every lawyer, at any rate, who follows the traditions of our profession, sitting in the High Court of the Commonwealth would feel it his bounden duty to follow the decision of the Privy Council. I think the noble Earl will agree that, if I have pointed out, as I trust I have, that far wider rights of appeal are reserved, and are kept alive under the existing form of the Bill than would have existed under the Bill as introduced, and if I have pointed out that the door is open in times of political agitation for the High Court to send questions to be decided by an impartial tribunal, almost every argument he has used in support of the view that the Bill as now presented to the House is inferior to the Bill as it was brought to this country is cut away. I apologise for having troubled your Lordships at such length. But, believing as I do that in the interests of the colonies, quite as much as in the interests of Great Britain, it is desirable that the right of appeal should not be interfered with, I am satisfied that the clause as it now stands is a vast improvement upon the form in which it was brought over by the delegates from the colonies. It is because I hold that opinion strongly that I have ventured to raise my voice, for the first time in your Lordships' House, in opposition to the view of the noble Earl.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 3ª accordingly, and passed.

MARRIAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.].

Amendments reported (according to Order).

UNION OF BENEFICES ACT, 1860, AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.].

[THIRD READING.]

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

THE DUKE OF NORTHUMBERLAND: My Lords, before this Bill is passed I should like to call attention to one matter which has excited a feeling of anxiety on the part of antiquaries. One of the inconveniences of the prevailing method of legislating by reference is that it is extremely difficult for ordinary laymen to understand exactly the scope of a particular Bill. I am informed that under the Union of Benefices Act, 1860, a large number of churches in the metropolis have been pulled down and destroyed, and that by extending this Act to the whole of England you are putting it in the power of certain persons to pull down and destroy any parish church in any part of England. If that be the case I think it is a very grave power to give. The parish churches of England are absolutely unique from an historical point of view. And I cannot but think that if for certain reasons benefices are to be united there should be some machinery for handing over the disused churches to some responsible persons, either to the county council or to some other public body. I trust that if this Bill is taken up in another place this point will be attended to, and that we shall not be led by the vicious form of legislation by reference to sanction something which we otherwise would not permit.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, there are various cases in which it is important that the powers which have been exercised in the metropolis should be extended to other parts of the country. For instance, you have in the city of Exeter a considerable number of churches which are really of no use at all, the population of the parishes being so exceedingly small that they do not work as parishes ought to work. Moreover, the incomes have been so small that it is practically impossible to get anyone to remain for a considerable period. The removal of these churches would be in every respect a great gain, as the removal of similar churches has been a great gain in the metropolis. As I explained when this Bill was read a second time, the city of Norwich contains a great number of churches of precisely the same character, and there are many other cases throughout the country. The Bill has had the consent of the Convocation of Canterbury and of all the bishops of that Convocation, and it is a Bill which is very much needed in the interests of the Church.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 3ª accordingly, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

That such Committee have power to agree with the Committee of the House of Commons in the appointment of a Chairman."—(Earl Waldegrave.)

*LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY: My Lords, I do not rise to object to the names of the Members proposed—they are as good a selection as I believe could have been made — but to ask Her Majesty's Government why there is to be this inquiry, and at whose instance it has been set on foot. There are most ill-omened words in this notice. It is proposed to inquire whether economy and efficiency of administration will be promoted by any change in the constitution of Queen Anne's Bounty Board or by its amalgamation with any other body. That can only mean amalgamation with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, as nobody would think of the Charity Commissioners in this respect. I venture to think that those who have contributed money to Queen Anne's Bounty would not think it was equally safe with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and I hope the noble Marquess at the head of the Government will be able to allay their anxiety and dispel their fears on this subject. Why, I ask, is there to be this inquiry into the efficiency of the administration? I have been familiar with the administration of the Bounty for nearly thirty years, and can testify to the fact that the economy and efficiency of its administration have been much greater than the economy and efficiency of the administration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The work of the Bounty has increased very much of late years, and large additions have been made to the sums invested in its name, but the expenses have not increased. Again, why is this inquiry to be made, just when the late secretary of Queen Anne's Bounty has departed this life? It is not suggested that an inquiry should be made into his administration; but why take advantage of the death of an efficient servant to make this attack on the Bounty? This question has been sprung upon the House and upon the public, and I heard nothing of it until I saw this motion on your Lordships' Paper.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): The noble Lord has mentioned me, and I will answer him, not from my own knowledge, but from information derived from high authority. I am told that Queen Anne's Bounty is a very remarkable corporation. It seems to have been the fashion in the last century in constituting these corporations to make them a numerous body of men, selected from those already overworked. Such was the idea then to secure efficient administration. I am told that Queen Anne's Bounty Board includes all the Bishops, all the deans —I am not sure whether all the Privy Councillors—["Yes."]—all the sheriffs, all the mayors, all the aldermen, and all Queen's counsel. Of course it is only by the exercise of a great deal of self-denial on the part of these gentlemen that business goes on. If all of them attended the meetings and took active part in proceedings, the transaction of business would be beset with difficulties. I am told, however, that they are not required to be summoned to attend, and the danger arising from their number is therefore diminished. It is only necessary to insert an advertisement in the London Gazette, and as that journal is not so widely read as its merits deserve, there is not a large attendance of all these Bishops, deans, aldermen, etc., and confusion is avoided. I understand that it has entered into the heads of some revolutionary persons that possibly this body might be amended. To explain the matter which is disturbing the mind of my noble friend, it was thought wiser to commence action at a time when no one had vested interest as secretary, so that an unnecessary demand should not be made upon the resources of the Church. That is all the explanation I have to give. I believe those composing the Committee are careful men, and will not prune these bishops, deans, aldermen, and other dignitaries without sufficient cause, but I think the House will admit that there is some case for legislation.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: As one of the body to whom my noble friend has referred, I may say that I have been a member of that body since 1865, and I can assure him that I have never once attended.

On Question, agreed to.

Ordered, That such Committee have power to agree with the Committee of the House of Commons in the appointment of a Chairman.

VETERINARY SURGEONS AMENDMENT BILL.

Brought from the Commons, read 1ª, and to be printed. (No. 164.)

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS—MR. BURDETT-COUTTS'S CHARGES—COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Before the House adjourns I wish to ask the Secretary for War whether he can inform the House what has been decided as to the Committee which is to inquire into the question of medical appliances during the war in South Africa and the complaints of alleged negligence as to the treatment of the sick and wounded, especially those suffering from enteric fever, and what is likely to be the nature of the Committee which the Government have undertaken to appoint.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): The Committee or Commission—I am not quite sure which it will be—will be presided over by Lord Justice Romer, and I am sure I only have to mention his name in order to satisfy your Lordships that the inquiry will be conducted in a thoroughly judicial and dispassionate tone and spirit. With Lord Justice Romer we propose to associate two others. We think that to do its work with efficiency this body should be a small one. One of the two other gentlemen will represent the medical and the other the surgical profession. For the selection of a representative of the medical profession we determined to refer to the Royal College of Physicians, and we addressed ourselves to the distinguished gentleman who presides over that body, Dr. Church, and invoked his assistance. We asked him either to move the college to recommend a representative, or, if he was prepared to do so, to place his own services at our disposal. I am happy to say that he has chosen the latter alternative, and I do not think a more fortunate selection could be made. With regard to the surgeons, we should, in ordinary circumstances, have addressed ourselves in the same way to the Royal College of Surgeons. But your Lordships, or those of you who have paid attention to the question, are no doubt aware that the name of the distinguished President of the Royal College of Surgeons, Sir William MacCormac, has figured conspicuously in this controversy, and we felt it was hardly fair to ask him to recommend a representative of his college. We have selected a gentleman whose name is probably known to many of your Lordships, Professor Cunningham, Professor of Anatomy and Physiology in Dublin University. He is a man of most distinguished reputation. He holds degrees of the University of Edinburgh, at which he has held high office, and he now occupies a high office in the University of Dublin. These are the three members of the Committee. The reference (I am quoting from memory) runs in these words:—"To report as to the arrangements for the care and treatment of the sick and wounded during the campaign in South Africa." My lords, I will only add to what I have already said that I have sometimes seen it stated that it was our intention to appoint a Departmental Committee. No such intention was ever entertained, as far as I am aware, by any member of Her Majesty's Government.

House adjourned at Twenty-five minutes before Seven of the clock, till To-morrow, a quarter past Four of the clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Thursday, 5th July, 1900.

SPALDING URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (WATER) BILL. (BY ORDER.)

Lords Amendments considered.

Amendments as far as the Amendment in page 6, line 21, agreed to.

Page 6, line 21, to leave out from "1889," to the end of Clause 9, the next Amendment, read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth agree with the Lords in the said Amendment."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.) said he desired to bring before the House what threatened to be a great personal grievance and injustice to two of the employees of the company which this Bill absorbed. The circumstances were that for the last forty years Mr. Stimson had been the engineer to the company, and had largely assisted to bring it up to its present condition. He left the Great Northern Railway Company to join this company. If he had kept to the old company he would have been in receipt of a pension of some £70 a year. In this House the promoters of the Bill themselves inserted a proviso that any employee of the old company taken over by the Bill who had been ten years in the service of the Water Company should be entitled to compensation, the amount of which should be fixed by an assessor appointed by the Board of Trade. He thought the feeling of the House would be that an employee of forty years not only came within the strict letter of the clause inserted by the promoters themselves, but that the clause was the policy and practice of Parliament, and it was a right and just clause. How was a man sixty-two years of age to make a new departure in his employment? He would have an equitable claim, the strongest possible claim, on his old employers, but he would have no such claim on the new authority established by the Bill. The principle for which he was contending had been admitted by the promoters themselves, inasmuch as they had come to an agreement with the secretary to give him £500 compensation, although he was only receiving a salary of £30 a year and some legal fees. Having disarmed opposition in the House of Commons by inserting the clause, the promoters, when the Bill reached another place, without any of the parties being communicated with, caused the clause to be struck out. And yet in the circular they had issued to hon. Members they positively complained that the engineer and collector had allowed this to be done without petition. The promoters' answer to his opposition now was that the services of these two employees were to be taken over. That might have been all right centuries ago when people were, like goods and chattels, or like live stock, to be transferred with an estate. But surely those he represented had some title to being consulted before they were thus treated after their long years of service. They naturally objected to this treatment, and they pointed out that the promoters had already conceded the principle of compensation in the case of the secretary, as well as by themselves inserting in the Bill the clause which had subsequently been struck out in the Lords. He believed that the Chairman of Committees had been appealed to in regard to the matter, and, with that regard for right and justice which he had always shown, he had gone into the facts and had suggested that the parties should agree amicably to an arrangement which he believed to be fair and proper. Now, he (Sir Albert) did not presume to express any opinion upon the figures arrived at by the right hon. Gentleman. But he did venture to suggest that the promoters, having conceded the principle of compensation by themselves inserting a clause providing that it should be assessed by an arbitrator, it was only fair and proper that they should be held to it. He was sure the House would not allow a single employee to be taken out from the general body and placed completely in the cold. The gentlemen whom he represented declined to enter the service of the new authority. They asked that the promoters should be bound by their own clause, and that the provision that the amount of compensation due to them should be assessed by an arbitrator should be re-inserted in the Bill.

MR. RECKITT (Lincolnshire, Brigg) supported the hon. Member for South Islington in his effort to secure the re-insertion in the Bill of the clause which would secure compensation for the collector and engineer. It was a usual proceeding to insert such a clause, and he remembered that a Bill was passed a year ago in which an urban district council agreed to purchase some gasworks, and in that Bill there was a clause providing that, in the case of any officer or servant who had been in the service of the company twelve years or upwards, they should, if they declined to continue in their posts, have a right to compensation. Now, the present Bill simply provided that these two men should be taken over with the undertaking. But was it not rather hard on a man sixty-two years of age that he should be expected to begin life afresh in the service of the district council? Was it not quite possible that at the end of seven or eight years he would have to give up his position, and then he would have no claim for consideration at the hands of the council? It was only right that the House should safeguard his interests, and see that he was properly treated, either by the company who were selling the undertaking or by the authority who were purchasing it. He would like to point out that there was a clause in the Bill providing that, in the event of the urban district council and the water company being unable to agree as to the price to be paid for the undertaking, the dispute should be submitted to arbitration. Surely the right of the officials of the company to compensation formed one of those considerations which should go to determine the total price to be paid by the urban authority. The question the House had to decide was whether these two servants of the water company were to receive any compensation. They were perfectly satisfied with the Bill as it was originally laid on the Table of the House. The promoters now suggested that no petition against the Bill had been presented by these gentlemen. In taking up that attitude he did not think they were acting squarely towards the House. It was well known that heavy costs were entailed upon individuals who had to appear by counsel before a Parliamentary Committee in order to protect their interests in a Bill of that character. The tax was sufficiently severe in the case of wealthy people, and how could persons like an engineer or a rate-collector be expected to bear it? They ought not to be put to unnecessary hardship and expense, and he submitted, therefore, that it was only fair that the Bill should be restored to the form in which it passed the House of Commons—a form which sufficiently protected the interests of these two people.

MR. POLLOCK (Lincolnshire, Spalding) said he wished to point out that the Bill provided that the urban authority should take over these two gentlemen with the undertaking, and they would receive the same salary as they had hitherto received from the company. He thought that that sufficiently protected their interests, and he would be very sorry indeed if, in consequence of the opposition now being offered, the passing of the Bill was delayed. There was no reason whatever why either of the two officials should refuse to be transferred.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Will the Chairman of Committees give the House the advantage of his advice? It seems to me very strange indeed that a clause passed by the House of Commons should have thus been struck out in the House of Lords.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): I shall be very glad indeed if I can assist the House in coming to a decision on this matter. The facts are quite clear, and I think they have been adequately brought out. The position of these two gentlemen, I admit, is one which deserves consideration; but I doubt very much, notwithstanding what has fallen from the hon. Member for South Islington, whether this engineer has any right to receive any compensation at all from the present company in whose service he has been so long. So far as I can ascertain he would have no legal right whatever to compensation if the company were to dismiss him forthwith, assuming, of course, that the dismissal was a proper one. That being so the question arises, have these gentlemen any greater right against the council which has taken over the undertaking than they have against the company itself? I came to the conclusion, after hearing the arguments on both sides, that they had no legal right to compensation at all, but that in one respect they were put in a worse position under the Bill under their new masters than they would have been under their old masters, for it is pretty certain that a company which benefited by their services for so many years would never let them leave without some solatium or some pension, even although they might not be legally entitled to it. But the district council have undertaken to continue to employ them. Their case differs from that of the secretary of the company whose office has been abolished, and who consequently was entitled to compensation. When the parties were before me I suggested that a compromise might be arrived at, and, having been informed of the wages these two men were receiving, I made a certain proposal to counsel in the case. I suggested, in fact, that an amicable settlement might be arrived at by the payment of a sum of £350 to these officials. I understood that the council was prepared to agree to that, but, unfortunately, the individuals in question have taken a higher view of their rights, and they are asking the House to give them full compensation in respect of their services, compensation to be paid, not by the company to whom those services were rendered, but by the ratepayers who are taking over the business of the company. I regret extremely that my suggestion has not been accepted. I believe it would have been judicious on the part of these gentlemen to have accepted it, and under the circumstances I would suggest that the House do agree with the Lords Amendment, striking out the compensation clause. In the notice of the original Bill there was nothing whatever about such a clause, and it seems to have been inserted in the Bill through an error of the draughtsman and contrary to the instructions of the district council. It was not until the Bill had passed through the House of Commons that the council discovered that the clause had been inserted, and they at once applied to the other House to have it struck out. That is the position of matters now. I believe that under the Local Government Act of 1888, as well as the Act of 1894, general principles are laid down for dealing with these matters, and it is provided that where a servant is continued in his employment by a county council on taking over the undertaking he is not entitled to receive compensation in respect of past services, but that where his services are brought to an end through his office being abolished he is entitled to compensation. If we follow that principle in this case we must agree to the Lords Amendments, and the result will be that we shall leave these gentlemen in the employ of their new masters, and they will not be left stranded after many years service.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, W.): I am absolutely ignorant of the facts of this case, but I think it is one in which, to some extent, the character of the House of Commons for justice and fairness is involved. It is our duty, as far as possible, to protect those who cannot protect themselves. I quite agree with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the general principle which has been laid down for the guidance of this House in dealing with these matters. In the Bill as it passed through this House, a clause was inserted protecting the interests of these two gentlemen. If it was wrongly inserted it was the business of the promoters to have found it out and to have applied to get it struck out by this House. But they did nothing of the kind until the Bill reached another place, and now we naturally have representations made of the injustice which it is alleged is being done to these two officials by the striking out of the clause without notice to them and without their having had any opportunity of opposing such a proceeding. We are now asked to agree to the Lords Amendment and to leave a servant of forty years standing at the mercy of new employers, who, of course, will not look upon him very amicably, having regard to the attitude he has taken up here. He will be liable to be dismissed at three months notice. I do not think the House of Commons should part with a Bill which inflicts an injustice of that sort, and I would therefore suggest that the debate should be postponed, so that the parties may have another opportunity of going before the Chairman of Committees in order to endeavour to arrive at a settlement. Whatever these gentleman are entitled to, let them have it secured to them by Act of Parliament. Do not allow the clause which protects them to be struck out, and thereby leave them at the mercy of people whom they have been fighting in this House. I beg to move that this debate be now adjourned.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."—(Sir Henry Fowler.)

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I have no objection to the course proposed by the right hon. Gentleman. I can assure him that during the last fortnight I have done my best to bring these parties together. I shall be very glad indeed if a settlement can be arrived at, even if the terms I have suggested are not strictly adhered to. The adjournment at any rate will afford the parties an opportunity of reconsidering the matter, and I trust that, as a result, an amicable settlement may be arrived at, although I confess I have no very great hope of it. I am afraid the House will be troubled again with it.

Question put, and agreed to.

Debate to be resumed upon Thursday next.

LONDON COUNTY TRAMWAYS (No. 1) BILL. (BY ORDER.)

Order for consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

*MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I rise to move the re-committal of this Bill, and I will state, as shortly as I can, the reasons why I am asking the House to revise the decision of the Committee. The point I have to raise is one in regard to which I submit a decision should not have been come to by a Committee, but which should have been determined by the House itself on the motion for the Second Reading. It is one of essential importance and great public interest, and it affects the pockets of Her Majesty's subjects to a very considerable extent. I am sure, therefore, that, in taking this step, I shall have with me the sympathy of Members of this House. The London County Council have brought two Bills before this House. One of them has already been sent to another place and is under consideration by a Lords Committee, The other—the one with which we are now dealing—has been passed by a Committee of this House, and I am not going to impugn any conclusion at which the Committee arrived on the merits of the Bill. The parties for whom I am concerned — the local authority for the borough of Wandsworth—have a locus standi by law, and have a right under an Act of Parliament to put a veto upon the measure which the County Council have brought before the House. Without saying whether it is reasonable or not that that veto should be continued I have a right to say, and I think it will be admitted, that they have a locus standi to be heard whether or not, and on what terms, that veto should be taken away or modified. I consider that is a fair question for discussion. The London County Council are now recognised as the proper authority for working tramways in London. Their trams necessarily run through the districts of many authorities. But they have not yet been made, nor are they likely to be made by statute, the road authority. The District Board of Works in Wandsworth is the road authority for that part of London, and the question is whether that Board of Works shall continue to have its veto with regard to interference with the roads for the maintenance of which it is responsible. What I have now to submit is that these authorities ought not to be put to the expense thrown directly upon them of appearing twice over, both in this House and the other, upon two Bills introduced for the same purpose. They have already had to contest one of the Bills in this House, and they are now contesting in the other House No. 2 Bill, and if the House does not listen to my appeal they will also have to enter an appearance in the House of Lords on No. 1 Bill, on precisely the same grounds as they had to in the case of No. 2 Bill. I need not trouble the House with the literatim et verbatim of the Bill, but I will just refer very shortly to the evidence given by three witnesses of the most undoubted authority as to whether these two Bills do not cover the same matter. Mr. Benn, formerly a Member of this House, and Chairman of the Tramway Committee of the London County Council, said that there was no doubt that if No. 2 Bill was carried, the powers sought for under No. 1 Bill would be unnecessary, so far as the case of construction was concerned. Mr. Kennedy was asked whether there was anything in connection with the Westminster and Tooting line—which is the line to which this Bill refers—which could not be done under the other Bill which could be done under this, and he said no. Mr. Cripps also gave similar evidence. Those admissions are sufficient for my present purpose, and I submit to the House that if the local authorities are subjected to the ordeal of appearing upon their locus standi twice in both Houses, it will be a most scandalous waste of public money. The London County Council are also using the ratepayers' money, and for the ratepayers to have to bear the expense of both sides, the promoters and the opponents, is an injustice against which, I think, this House will extend its protection. Then it is said, "Why do you not put down Amendments to this Bill which cover those powers which are contained in the other Bill?" The answer is, because the matter is highly technical. One Bill is to give authority to the London County Council to apply electric traction to all the tramways that it now possesses or may hereafter acquire, and the other is for powers to construct and reconstruct and open roads, and other matters, all of which could be done under the other Bill. We have a right to be heard, and the local authorities have been advised that upon this point they have a good case both in this House and the other, if not to throw out the Bill in accordance with their desire, at least that proper and reasonable conditions should be made, upon which they ought to have the right of veto, if necessary. That is the point which I have to put before the House. I should, perhaps, say one more word upon the subject of amending this Bill in this House. Although there are only two clauses which mention specifically, by name, this particular line, if those clauses were amended as general clauses you could not very well tamper with them without considering whether the other clauses of the Bill would not also have to be amended by consequential Amendments; and to have to go all through this Bill and study it, and bring in a lot of mere verbal, technical Amendments, would not only weary the House, but, in my opinion, it would be a manifest and unnecessary waste of the time of the House. If the House assents to the suggestion that the money of the ratepayers should not be wasted in opposing two Bills when one is sufficient, and where the people are prepared to accept the decision of any Committee—on that question the Parliamentary agents of the local authorities and the London County Council would simply have to meet and settle the principle, and they would not be in the Committee Room twenty minutes, whereas if the details are discussed in this House it might take several hours. It may be thought that I should have approached the parties and tried to arrange this matter without troubling the House at all, but I have sought the intervention of the House, which, I believe, sympathises with us in our difficulty. It has been suggested by the local authorities that the two Bills might be submitted to one Committee of the House of Lords, and I undertake, on behalf of those whom I represent, to be satisfied with one decision, and why the London County Council should want to go before two Committees I do not know, unless it be that if they happen to be beaten on the one Bill they think they may succeed on the other. But I think under the circumstances the House will stand between them and the ratepayers' money being squandered in this way, and in that belief I beg to move that the Bill be recommitted to the former Committee on the Bill, and if this motion is carried, I shall move an Instruction to the Committee to leave out such provisions of the Bill as are included in the London Tramways (No. 2) Bill, passed on 30th April.

*MR. THORNTON (Clapham), in seconding the motion of the hon. Member for Wandsworth, said that he had no desire in any way to thwart the London County Council in their efforts to acquire tramways, and to show his bona fides he might state that it was his earnest desire to see the tramway system in that part of Clapham and Battersea, which he represented, extended and put forward immediately. The position which he took up was identical with that of the hon. Member for Wandsworth: that two Bills dealing with the same subject, having the same object in view, were unnecessary. One Bill (No. 2) had already passed the House, and they were now confronted with another (No. 1) which proposed to deal with exactly the same subject. The Wandsworth District Board had opposed that Bill, and was now opposing it in the House of Lords. In asking that the Bill be recommitted, he desired it to be distinctly understood that their action was not due to any hostility towards the tramways. He had had, by the merest chance, placed in his hands that day the case for the London County Council, and he saw nothing to object therein until he came to the statement that "if this motion for recommittal be carried the Bill must be lost." He denied that averment, because it was competent for the Parliamentary agents of both sides to put their heads together and arrive at a decision whereby the two Bills might be sent to a Committee of the House of Lords. There was a principle involved in the matter. The House could not desire to set a precedent whereby not two Bills dealing with the same subject could be brought before them but four or five, because if two why not more. He thought that if the London County Council would meet the local authorities half way in the matter they would be doing a just, if not a generous thing.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out from the word 'Bill,' to the end of the Question, and add the words 'be recommitted to the former Committee on the Bill,' instead thereof."—(Mr. Kimber.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): Both the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken in support of this motion have signified their general approval of the measure before the House, and the hon. Gentleman who last addressed the House denied that if it were recommitted it would be lost. But anybody who is acquainted with the forms of this House knows perfectly well that if this Bill were referred back for reconsideration to-day it could not be carried into law this year. There can be no doubt about that, and I leave it to private Members acquainted with the procedure of this House to confirm the truth of what I say. It is extremely difficult to see what the complaint of the two hon. Gentlemen amounts to. They say they are complaining because certain clauses in this Bill exist in the Bill called No. 2 Bill, which has already passed this House, and which is for a totally different purpose. The two Bills are quite distinct, and there is nothing more common than for two different and distinct Bills to be introduced in this House with similar clauses. No. 2 Bill received most careful consideration from the Committee presided over by the hon. Member for Norwich. The Bill referred entirely to the point as to how electric traction shall be fitted to the existing tramways which the London County Council now possesses. It does not sanction the construction of any new lines or propose to sanction them. Now we come to the question of electric traction on these tramways. As regards the first Bill, which affects a large number of local authorities, the County Council consulted no fewer than forty local authorities in London, and a large amount of interchange of opinion has taken place between them with the view of getting some workable scheme of electric traction. It is the case that under the scheme which has passed this House the County Council is to make an application, and the Board of Trade is to decide, but not until it has heard the local authorities. That has been agreed to by the County Council and the local authorities, with the exception of the local authorities now objecting to this Bill. Exactly the same clauses with regard to the methods of electric traction which have passed the House in the Bill already sent up to the Lords are placed in this Bill. If in this Bill you do not pass these same clauses you will have this peculiar state of things. You will have the existing tramways as far as electric traction is concerned governed by a certain law, and you will have interposing pieces of new tramways excluded from that law, and therefore you will bar the whole development of the electric system in London. That is simply the position. The hon. Gentleman proposes that something should be done in the House of Lords about our sending this to the same Committee. The hon. Gentleman ought to be as well acquainted as I am with the fact that this is not the place where the procedure of the House of Lords can be determined. We have made a statement, which is in the hon. Gentleman's hands, which practically covers the ground of the whole opposition. It has been arranged by the County Council and the local authorities that whatever Amendments, if any, in respect of electric traction are made in the House of Lords in No. 2 Bill as regards the existing lines shall also be extended and made applicable to the new works under No. 1 Bill. It is obviously our interest and our desire to have the clauses identical both for the old tramways and the new. There are not two hearings called for in this matter. Two hearings have been asked by the hon. Gentleman and those whom he is representing for the moment in this place. Both Committees have most wisely passed these clauses and sent them to this House. I trust that the House will send the clauses to the House of Lords in both Bills. The House of Lords can reject or pass them as it pleases.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea): As representing a district through which these two tramways run, I wish to dissociate myself from the motion of the hon. Member for Wandsworth, which was supported by the hon. Member for Clapham. I hope to give the House one or two reasons why they should not deprive London for another year of the electric traction which two Committees of the House have said the London County Council ought to have. In saying this I think it is necessary to give a fact or two. The London County Council have in operation one or two tramways drawn by horses on the south side of London. That is obviously an inadequate system, and not at all up to the requirements of the housing problem, and it is not in keeping with the accommodation which the people require in the way of rapid transit. The County Council introduced two tramway Bills—one to substitute electric traction for horses, and the other to extend the existing tramways and to make new ones. In promoting these Bills the County Council has wisely and considerately approached forty London local authorities, and got their views as to road material, road maintenance, and the minor improvements necessary to carry out a good system of electric traction, and I am sorry to think that of all the forty authorities the only obdurate ones were Wandsworth and Clapham. Encouraged by that obstinacy, my own parish got off the right lines and was for a moment disposed to do the wrong thing, but after being confronted with the fact that its opposition would lead to the whole five millions of London being deprived of electric traction for another year, like the sensible district it is it recovered itself, it pulled itself together, and declined to associate itself with Wandsworth, which has alternately played the role of Dr. Jekyll to-day and Mr. Hyde to-morrow. The request put forward by Battersea was this : that where the London County Council tramways went through the parish the County Council should be called upon to put a good electric current down and also to lay the road between the rails and a verge of eighteen inches on each side. The authorities now opposing the Bill went further than that, and asked that the whole length of the road should be paved with material to be determined not by the traction authority and the Board of Trade, but by the vestry. The result of such an unreasonable demand is that only the vestry is to get the veto, and the County Council is to pay for the whole of the road material along the tramway route. If Wandsworth and Clapham succeed to-day the veto of the vestries of London will be maintained, and the traction authority will be blackmailed into the cost of the road and street improvements and the paving of the tramway routes which ought properly to be borne partly by the local authorities. The local authorities ought to pay for their own roads, and not ask the metropolitan ratepayers to bear the cost of keeping up their main roads and streets. That is a condition of things the House of Commons ought not to tolerate. Two Committees have listened to the complaints of Wandsworth and Clapham, and these Committees have declared that there is not much in them. I trust that we shall give the County Council the powers they ask, and that we shall not allow the respectable vestries of Wandsworth and Clapham to stand in the way. In representing their views they had no need to employ counsel, and in paying for that they are responsible for every penny they had needlessly spent. The Council has given Wandsworth Vestry power to vote whether it should be a conduit or overhead system. The Council is going to have the conduit system. The Council has been so reasonable that thirty-eight out of forty have agreed with the Council view, and it is because the two hon. Gentlemen represent, unfortunately, the two obstinate districts that I have dissolved partnership with them, and that I appeal to the House of Commons not to listen to their appeals to-day, and to give to the County Council the power which they ought to have to introduce a system of cheap and speedy electric traction.

*MR. HOLLAND (Yorkshire, W.R., Rotherham) : I happened to be chairman of the Committee which considered this Bill. I did not understand that the hon. Member for Wandsworth wished to impugn the decision of that Committee.

MR. KIMBER : Not at all.

*MR. HOLLAND : That being so, I beg to assure the hon. Member that the Committee, after hearing all the arguments pro and con., decided not to exclude these particular clauses from the measure. I have a further objection to the proposal now before the House. It is proposed that the Bill should be recommitted to the same Committee. As chairman of that Committee, and in the name also of my colleagues on that Committee, I may say that we should object to this particular measure being committed to us again, because we have heard all the arguments already, and we know exactly what the decision would be. Therefore it would be a waste of time to send it back to that Committee. I wish to say, in conclusion, that this Bill, and also Bill No. 2, are the outcome of a Herculean amount of negotiation between the London County Council and the different local authorities; and it would indeed, in my view, be a grievous thing if that enormous amount of effort were to be brought to nought by the passing of this Resolution to-day, because the effect of that would be to destroy the Bill.

*Mr. PURVIS (Peterborough): I wish to say ditto to what has been stated by the hon. Member for Rotherham. There has been nothing new brought before us this afternoon. Everything has been considered most carefully, eminent counsel having brought out every point with equal clearness, and in every possible way. I hope the House will not delay the passing of the measure by recommitting it.

Mr. KIMBER: After what has been said by the Chairman of the Committee upon this point I do not think I will press this to a division. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the motion.

QUESTIONS.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—THE ATTACK ON THE TA-KU FORTS.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any information to the effect that Admiral Kempff opposed the policy of attacking the Ta-ku forts on the ground that by this attack the Chinese Regulars would be forced into an alliance with the Boxers; and what is the position at present of the American forces.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): We have no such information. Our admiral telegraphed that all the allied admirals at Ta-ku were working in perfect accord. The position of the American forces is doubtless the same as that of the other allied Powers.

RECENT NEWS—THE POSITION AT PEKING.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Will the right hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs say whether he has any news from China?

*MR. BRODRICK: We have no later news from Peking than that already communicated, and we have no confirmation of the report which has appeared to-day as to the massacre of Europeans in Peking. In the opinion of the Commanders an increase of force is required before an advance can take place. With respect to this we are hourly expecting a reply from the Japanese Government to our communications. Her Majesty's Government have intimated to the Chinese Minister that the authorities at Peking will be held to be personally guilty if the members of the European Legations and other foreigners in Peking suffer injury. The Chinese Minister has been requested to communicate this message in such manner as will ensure its reaching the authorities at Peking, and it will be made known to the Viceroys throughout China.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): Is the right hon. Gentleman in a position to give the House any information as to the strength of the guards, the stores, food, and ammunition at the Legation in Peking?

*MR. BRODRICK: No.

OFFICIAL RELATIONS WITH CHINA.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether this country is now at war with the Chinese Empire, and whether any attacks were made upon the Foreign Legations at Peking before Admiral Seymour began his hostile march upon that city.

*MR. BRODRICK: It is doubtful whether there is any organised Government in China with which this country could consider itself at war. The first attacks on the staffs of the Legations were made on June 9th and 10th. The summer quarters of the British Legation outside Peking were destroyed on June 10th. The advance on Peking on June 10th was made at the instance of the Ministers at Peking.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR — HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS—MR. BURDETT-COUTTS'S CHARGES—COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he will be able to inform the House as to the constitution and terms of reference of the proposed Committee which is to proceed to South Africa and inquire into the arrangements for treating the sick and wounded.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): We have anxiously considered how Lord Roberts's request for an impartial Commission can be best fulfilled, and we have laid down one or two principles. The first is that it shall be a very small Commission. We propose to appoint a Commission of not more than three persons. We think that the medical profession should be represented on that Commission, and we have consulted the President of the College of Physicians, and asked him to either serve himself or recommend some person who should serve. I am glad to say that Dr. Church has himself consented to serve, and I think that that appointment will meet with universal approval in all quarters. We should have been glad in a similar way to consult the Royal College of Surgeons with a view of having a gentleman appointed from the surgical branch of the profession, but we felt that it would be rather hard, and would put Sir William MacCormac in a difficult position, because he has been made the subject of criticism by, I think, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Westminster and other persons in connection with South Africa, and under those circumstances we did not think it would be fair to him to make the same point of consulting him as of consulting the President of the Royal College of Physicians. We have, however, found a gentleman who, we think, will command universal respect and confidence. It is Professor Daniel John Cunningham, professor of anatomy and physiology in Trinity College, Dublin. He is an authority well known to many gentlemen in this House, and I believe all who do know him—I have not that personal honour—will agree that he is fitted to carry out the difficult and delicate duties which are entrusted to him. The third member of the Commission we think should be a layman and should not belong to the medical profession. We have been fortunate enough to secure the services of a man who I think will command universal confidence in the person of Lord Justice Romer, who has consented to serve. These three gentlemen will form, I believe, as strong, able, and impartial a Commission as could deal with this difficult matter.

SIR. H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: What are the terms of the reference?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: To report on the arrangements for the care and treatment of the sick and wounded during the South African campaign.

MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has made any preparation for the discharge of Lord Justice Romer's judicial duties?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Before Lord Justice Romer accepted the Lord Chancellor had to be consulted. The responsibility rests with him. I have no doubt that arrangements for that purpose will be made.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): I desire to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will give this House an opportunity of discussing the terms of reference and the scope and composition of the Commission. I may state that I have the strongest possible objection to one name on that Commission.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will tell me what his objection is. I see no reason whatever for giving the opportunity asked for.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): Does the reference include the power of inquiry into the organisation of the Army Medical Department?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That, Sir, is not a question referred to the Commission, but I have no doubt that their finding will have a bearing on it.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government will appoint an independent Commission to inquire as to the responsibility of the War Office in connection with the treatment of the sick and wounded in South Africa and into the organisation and present condition of the Army Medical Department, such Commission to sit immediately and conduct its inquiry independently of the Commission which it is proposed to send to South Africa.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Two independent and simultaneous Commissions, whose duties would overlap, seem to me to be very objectionable.

NEW ZEALAND CONTINGENT—TREATMENT OF THE SICK AND WOUNDED.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Government of New Zealand have addressed a communication to the Home Government with reference to the treatment of the sick and wounded of the New Zealand contingent, and of those who have been invalided home; and, if so, whether he will lay the correspondence upon the Table of the House.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): The only communication I have received from the Government of New Zealand on this subject is the following telegram from Lord Ranfurly, dated 3rd July—

"My Government have received great complaints from contingents with regard to hospital arrangements in South Africa. New Zealand is prepared to meet any costs for comforts or attendance on them."

To this I have sent the following reply—

"In reply to your telegram of yesterday (hospital arrangements) Her Majesty's Government regret to learn that such complaints have been made. Although owing to military exigencies there may have been unavoidable temporary deficiencies, as to which Her Majesty's Government propose to hold full inquiry, ample supplies are available, and Her Majesty's Government, while appreciating offer to meet cost of attendance, consider that any such expense should be properly borne by Imperial funds."

MR. DILLON: Was there not a complaint that some of the New Zealand contingent had been sent home badly clothed?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have read the only communication received on the subject.

CENSORSHIP REGULATIONS.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): On behalf of the hon. Member for the Rushcliffe Division of Nottinghamshire, I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the fact that minutes from the Prime Minister and Governor of Natal and Generals Murray and Buller, respecting the censorship in that colony of letters and telegrams, have been made public at the request of those who wrote them, he will now lay upon the Table any documents which have been issued by the Government, or those responsible in South Africa, prescribing or dealing in any way with the manner in which the censorship of telegrams or letters should be carried out in South Africa or elsewhere.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If this question refers, as I presume it does, to the censorship over Press communications, as far as I know there are no documents, the whole responsibility resting with the generals in South Africa.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR: The question refers to the censorship of letters and telegrams, not solely to the censorship of documents.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, with regard to foreign telegrams and relations with foreign countries, no doubt there are documents, and we have no objection to publishing anything that has been published in Natal or anything that has been made public through the international bureau at Berne.

SPION KOP DESPATCHES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will explain why the explantion given by Sir Redvers Buller in his despatches on the Spion Kop disaster, with reference to his failure to exercise proper control over General Warren, was not included in the published portions of those despatches, and will he state why the remarks of Lord Roberts conveying a censure on Sir Redvers Buller for abstaining from the assertion of his authority as the officer in chief command over General Warren were published, while Sir Redvers Buller's explanation of the circumstances under which he so abstained has been withheld from the public.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The Secretary of State published without omission two despatches from Sir C. Warren, and two covering despatches from Sir Redvers Buller. He also published Lord Roberts's comments on these four documents. He did not, as I pointed out in debate, publish a number of other documents, including one from Sir Redvers Buller, which was marked by him "not necessarily for publication."

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): And was that Sir Redvers Buller's explanation of his conduct with regard to Sir Charles Warren? Yes, or no?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have no intention of re-discussing the exercise made of his discretion by the Secretary of State.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: We will discuss it on the Estimates.

PAARDEBERG DESPATCHES.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state when the despatch giving the official account of the battle of Paardeberg will be published.

*MR. WYNDHAM: This question will be answered with one later on standing in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

PUBLICATION OF DESPATCHES.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when it is intended to make any further publication of despatches describing military operations in South Africa, including those relating to the action at Magersfontein, the advance to Bloemfontein, the siege of Ladysmith, and other operations in Natal.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: After the controversies which have occurred on this subject there is, of course, some difficulty in deciding when the despatches should be published, but I hope they will be published without very long delay. I will consult with my noble friend the Secretary for War on the subject.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman bear in mind that the siege of Ladysmith is a thing long past and gone?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes, that is so.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman also bear in mind that the Koorn Spruit disaster took place on 31st March, and will he tell us the hero of that transaction?

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): On behalf of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when further despatches and documents relating to political affairs in South Africa will be laid before the House; and whether, in any case, such Papers will be in the hands of Members before the Vote for the Colonial Office is taken.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My right hon. friend proposes to lay Papers in the course of the next fortnight.

HOSPITAL ORDERLIES.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): On behalf of the Member for the Ilkeston Division of Derbyshire, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can state the number of hospital orderlies employed in South Africa in the weeks ending 17th March, 21st April, and 19th May respectively, distinguishing, if possible, those belonging to the Royal Army Medical Corps, the Volunteers, the St. John Ambulance Brigade, and other organisations.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The numbers of hospital orderlies employed in South Africa were as follows: 17th March, 2,936, including 560 St. John Ambulance Brigade; 21st April, 3,739, including 766 St. John Ambulance Brigade, 84 Militia Medical Staff Corps and 361 Volunteer Medical Corps; 19th May, 3,943, including 986 St. John Ambulance Brigade, 91 Militia Medical Staff Corps, and 492 Volunteer Medical Corps. This does not include the staff of such hospitals as the Yeomanry Hospital, Portland Hospital, etc., the subordinate male staff of which numbers 519, but of which it is not known how many are employed as orderlies. The returns of Medical Staff raised locally in addition to the above are not furnished to the War Office; but 1,200 stretcher bearers are known to have been raised in Natal, thereby releasing orderlies of the Royal Army Medical Corps for duty in the hospitals.

INQUIRIES INTO CAPTURES OF BRITISH TROOPS.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether there is to be any formal inquiry by the military authorities into the causes of any of the captures of British troops during the campaign in South Africa.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Queen's Regulations lay down that an inquiry must be held in such cases. We have no doubt that the Commander-in-Chief will see that such an inquiry is held whenever the circumstances demand it.

ST. JOHN AMBULANCE BRIGADE—MODERN GUNS FOR ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if there is any intention to recognise the services rendered in South Africa by the St. John Ambulance Brigade, nearly 1,500 of whose members have gone out to assist the Army Medical Corps; and whether there is any chance of our Artillery Volunteers being soon supplied with more modern guns.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Questions of this kind cannot be conveniently dealt with until the war in South Africa is over. Steps have been taken to supply the Artillery Volunteers with modern guns at the earliest possible date.

USE OF THE RAILWAY TO KIMBERLEY BY THE DE BEERS COMPANY.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether any information has been received at the War Office of a discussion between the military authorities at Cape Town and the representative of the De Beers Company respecting the running of trains from Cape Town to Kimberley during the period between the taking of Bloemfontein and the advance on Pretoria; and whether any such trains were run; and, if so, whether stores for the De Beers Company were sent to Kimberley by them.

*MR. WYNDHAM: No such information has been received at the War Office.

TREATMENT OF DISCHARGED SOLDIERS—CASE OF PRIVATE WEIR.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what explanation has the War Office to give for the removal from Netley Hospital of Private Robert Weir, of the 27th Inniskilling Fusiliers, who had served with his regiment all through the Natal campaign, and was sent home in an enfeebled state of body and mind, and of the deportation of this soldier, who is without a pension and has received no gratuity, to the workhouse at Enniskillen, where he is at present a pauper inmate.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Investigations are necessary before a question of this nature can be answered. I must request the hon. Member to postpone it.

SECTION 423 OF THE QUEEN'S REGULATIONS.

MR. SCOTT MONTAGU (Hampshire, New Forest): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that Section 423 of the Queen's Regulations is habitually infringed by all ranks in Her Majesty's Army, from generals to privates, he will consider the advisability of enforcing the said regulation, modifying it, or abolishing it.

*MR. WYNDHAM: There is no reason to suppose that the paragraph in question is habitually infringed, and the Commander-in-Chief sees no reason to alter it.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): What is this section?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member no doubt knows.

UNDER-AGE RECRUITS—CASE OF JOHN SMITH.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether it has come to the knowledge of the War Office that a boy named John Smith, under fifteen years of age, enlisted in the Meath Militia in April last without his parents' consent, and that his father has since appealed for his son's discharge; and whether he will see that the boy is discharged.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The officer commanding the regimental district is authorised to discharge a recruit who is under seventeen years old if his parents apply for his discharge, and prove his age by furnishing a certificate of birth.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Will this boy be discharged?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I will see into that.

RESERVE OFFICERS' RETIRING ALLOWANCES.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): On behalf of the hon. Member for the Henley Division of Oxford, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can explain why in the two classes of Reserve officers, namely, those who retired receiving a gratuity or lump sum, and those who retired on a pension, while both classes receive the full pay of their rank while serving, the officers entitled to pensions are deprived of their pensions, though no deductions are made in the case of officers who have received a gratuity, and can he state whether Reserve officers are being granted the usual allowances of their rank; and whether those officers who have been deprived of their pensions will become entitled to them as a matter of right on completion of their present service.

*MR. WYNDHAM: As there has been a good deal of misunderstanding on this point, perhaps I may be allowed to make a somewhat full statement. Retired pay is not granted to officers solely as a reward for work done; it is also a retaining fee, and is coupled with a liability to return to service. If an officer of military age refuses to return to service when summoned, his retired pay may be stopped as a punishment. That being so, the rule is, exactly as in the case of half pay, that the lower rate of pay drops when the full pay begins. An officer is not allowed to draw full pay and retired pay at the same time, any more than he is allowed to draw full pay and half pay at the same time. Turning to the case of the officer who retires with a gratuity. His gratuity is regarded as capitalised retired pay; he compounds for a gratuity instead of taking an annual rate of retired pay. Therefore, the rule was that when he came back to full pay the actuarial annual value of his gratuity should be deducted from his full pay. The Secretary of State has changed that rule for two reasons. In the first place, the gratuity is always much less than the actuarial value of the retired pay given for the same service. But the more practical point is that the gratuity was actually given as a lump sum and is not, as a rule, in the officers' possession when he is called upon to return to service, so that a deduction from full pay would in that case be a real hardship to the officer. The Secretary of State took a favourable view of those cases, and discontinued the deduction. In reply to the other two points in the question I may say that every officer recalled to service gets his allowances, unless he receives consolidated pay which includes allowances; and every officer who passed from retired pay to full pay when called out, will return to retired pay when the emergency is past.

REGIMENTAL DISTRICT COMMANDS.

MR. LEES KNOWLES (Salford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, although command pay is retained by an officer commanding a regimental district during his absence upon leave not exceeding thirty days at a time in the year, it is intended, under Army Order 119 of this year, that such an officer shall be deprived of it when he is detailed for fourteen days or more on extra duty, as for instance when he is in command of a Volunteer brigade at a camp of instruction; whether, during the time of such absence on extra duty, he is still in effect responsible for the work in his regimental district; and whether, if is intended that such an officer shall be so deprived, command pay will be given to the major left temporarily in command of the regimental district.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer the last paragraph of his question first. I have stated in reply to a former question of his that during the colonel's absence on duty the major who takes command draws the command pay. This is not the case when the colonel goes on leave, because leave means permission to be absent without deduction from pay. But the colonel is naturally not allowed to draw pay for the work he does not do in addition to a special rate of pay for the work he does.

VOLUNTEER CAMPS—SURGEONS' ALLOWANCES.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will explain why allowances for attendance at camp are only made to the senior surgeon of a Volunteer battalion, and not also to the junior surgeons; and whether the War Office will consider the claim of junior surgeons to have an allowance in respect of attendance in camp.

*MR. WYNDHAM: As I stated in answer to a question on 21st June, one medical officer is allowed in each unit, one additional for each brigade, and three for each bearer company. This is considered sufficient.

MR. CHANNING: Is the hon. Gentleman aware that this is considered a great hardship by a large number of the junior surgeons?

*MR. WYNDHAM: We could not possibly give a Volunteer battalion, at the cost of the public, a much larger medical staff than is allowed to a battalion of regular troops.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if a decision has yet been taken to facilitate the attendance of Volunteer surgeons in camp, and to enable the pay and allowances of one surgeon to be divided according to the attendance their private practice enables them to give.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir. The Secretary of State for War has decided to make this concession to the medical officers of Volunteer corps.

ARMY PENSIONS—CASE OF HENRY BEATTY.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin Co., N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the case of a man named Henry Beatty, who, after having been in the Army and Reserve for twenty-one years and six days, was discharged from the Reserve on 7th January, 1886, with a good conduct certificate; whether he is aware that the greater portion of Beatty's period of service was spent in the East Indies, where he contracted fever and ague, the effect of which has been absolutely to ruin his health and render him incapable of any active employment; and will he state whether Beatty is entitled to a pension; and, if so, to what pension, and, if the man has not received it, will he explain on what ground it has been withheld.

*MR. WYNDHAM: If the hon. Member will tell me the regiment from which Henry Beatty was discharged, his case shall be inquired into.

COMPULSORY RETIREMENT OF WAR OFFICE CLERKS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE (Kerry, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether the Order in Council of 29th November, 1898, paragraph 18 (General), gives authority to the Secretary of State for War to compulsorily retire from the Civil Service an abstractor clerk, gazetted to the War Office, who had made timely protest against being brought under its retrospective action.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): Certainly.

INDIAN FAMINE—RELIEF OPERATIONS.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN (Banffshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he can give any particulars, as to the different provinces, regarding the return of the cultivators from the famine camps to their villages, to cultivate their fields on account of the rain which has fallen; and whether he will state the measures which are being taken to feed them in their villages until their crops are ripe.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): In accordance with the instructions of the Famine Codes and with the advice of the Famine Commission, the large relief works are being gradually closed as the rainy season advances, and as inducements in the shape of home relief draw the people back to their villages. Arrangements are ready, or are being made, for relieving the destitute at their homes and for giving them employment at or near their villages. I have recently received the following information from the Government of India on this subject.

"Our relief measures have already far exceeded Code prescriptions, which are elastic, not rigid, and have been adapted by us to differing local requirements to entire satisfaction of local governments concerned. Thus in Central Provinces a multitude of kitchens will feed all comers during the rains. Aged and infirm relieved at home. Able-bodied labourers given local employment by village headmen at cost of State, wherever private demand for field labour slack. Sixty lakhs land revenue suspended out of the eighty-six demand. This sum added to twenty-seven lakhs special advances and thirty lakhs charitable relief will, in Chief Commissioner's opinion, secure active agriculture during the rains. Similar relief during rains adopted elsewhere. Bombay Government are extending kitchens and gratuitous lists and granting ryots advances for subsistence, selves and labourers, till next crop. They estimate twenty-five lakhs for this besides over sixty lakhs for seed and cattle. In Punjab small farmers and labourers will receive subsistence."

INDIAN FAMINE—SUGGESTED PARLIAMENTARY GRANT — LONDON INDIAN SOCIETY.

SIR WILLIAM WEDDERBURN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Prime Minister has received a memorial from the London Indian Society, praying for an Imperial grant in aid of the Indian famine; and if so, whether he will state what reply has been given.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand that such a memorial has been received by the Prime Minister.

INDIAN GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS—ATTEMPTED BRIBERY.

SIR SEYMOUR KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has yet heard from the Government of India why, in the report of the finding and sentence of a court martial at Ferozepore on a conductor charged with taking bribes from a contractor, blanks appeared in the Punjab command orders; and whether he can now give the required information as to who offered the bribe, on behalf of what firm the bribe was offered, what the stores were, and at whose instance the facts were suppressed.

*LORD G. HAMILTON: I am informed by the Government of India that the names were omitted by the Punjab military authorities from the report to which my hon. friend refers in consequence of a mistaken notion as to the legal liabilities which might be incurred by their publication. The goods in question were shipped by the Indian Brush Factory and were up to standard. They were rejected because the travelling agent who acted on their behalf offered a bribe to secure their passing. His name is Gordon.

ASHANTI—NATIVE RISING—INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is now in a position to give the House any information as to the British garrison in Coomassie and as to the relieving column. Is there any confirmation of the report that the garrison has succeeded in escaping?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have received this morning the following telegram from Colonel Willcocks:—

"Fumsu, 4th July.—Just received letter sent by Governor Hodgson, in which he states that he with 600 native soldiers under the command of Major Morris, departed from Coomassie, 23rd June, by way of Patiasa and Terrabum. Two British officers severely wounded; does not send names. Captain Bishop, inspector of constabulary, Gold Coast, and Ralph, Lagos Constabulary, and 100 native soldiers, have been left behind at Coomassie, with rations up to 15th July. I will personally relieve Coomassie by that date under any circumstances. Hodgson states that he intended to go over River Ofin by way of Mempong to Cape Coast, but I have applied to him by urgent special messengers to leave behind as many men as possible in order to give assistance to me to enter into Coomassie. Lieutenant-Colonel Burroughs, with 400 native soldiers, arrived at Dompoasi 1st July. Enemy's force taken completely by surprise; stockades evacuated by them. Burroughs captured forty guns, quantity of gunpowder and caps, and also killed thirty of the enemy; our loss, one native soldier killed in action, three native soldiers wounded."

ALIEN IMMIGRATION.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he is aware that in the three years 1897, 1898, and 1899, over 130,000 alien immigrants, other than seamen, landed in Great Britain permanently to augment the native population; that of these 64,000 were Russians, Poles, and Italians, or more than 30 per cent. more than in any previous period, and that this increase is still continuing; and whether, under these circumstances, he will explain why there there is a delay in fulfilling the undertaking given by him on 9th February, 1897, that the Government adheres to every pledge given on this subject, and that he hoped at no distant period to propose legislation to Parliament on the subject.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. RITCHIE, Croydon): The total number of aliens other than seamen recorded on the alien lists as having arrived in the United Kingdom from the Continent in 1897, 1898, and 1899, and not stated in those lists to hold through tickets to other countries was 130,520, of whom 64,127 were Russians, Poles, or Italians. The number of immigrants of these nationalities in 1899 was more than 30 per cent. greater than in any year since 1893.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: That is not an answer to my question. It is merely a repetition of the facts stated in it. I want to know the cause of the delay?

MR. RITCHIE: I am afraid I rather missed that point. I suppose no steps have been taken because the House has been engaged on other business.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): How many of these aliens have become enfranchised?

SMALL DWELLINGS ACQUISITION ACT, 1899 — LOANS TO LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

MR. BILLSON (Halifax): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board how many applications for loans under the Small Dwellings Acquisition Act, 1899, have been received from local authorities since the Act came into operation, and what amount of money has been advanced to local authorities in respect of such applications.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): No sum has at present been advanced to local authorities in England and Wales under the Act referred to, but the Local Government Board have received two applications for sanction to borrow money under the Act, and in one of these cases the loan has been sanctioned. I have no information as regards Scotland and Ireland.

INSTRUCTION IN COOKERY FOR BOYS.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education if his attention has been directed to the importance of giving instruction in cookery to boys likely to enter the mercantile marine service; and if he will consider the advisability of modifying the provisions of the Day and Evening Schools Codes so as to enable such instruction to be given to boys, when required, in seaport towns.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): Yes; the matter is now receiving consideration.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—CREWE CASE.

COLONEL MILWARD (Stratford-on-Avon): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General whether his attention has been directed to a judgment in the Crewe County Court, delivered by Judge Yate Lee upon 19th June, in which the judge held that he had not power to enforce by a commitment order the payment of compensation to an injured workman under the Workmen's Compensation Act; and whether, failing the county court, there is any other inexpensive tribunal open to workmen whose employers fail or decline to pay compensation.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): My attention has been called to the judgment in question. I am informed that another learned county court judge has decided the other way, and I hope that before long the point may be settled by the judgment of a superior court. With regard to the second paragraph of my hon. friend's question, I must point out that the decision as to commitment orders does not preclude the enforcement of the award by execution or otherwise.

HINCKLEY POST OFFICE.

MR. M'LAREN (Leicestershire, Bosworth): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the attention of the Postmaster General has been called to a recent report of the medical officer of health for the town of Hinckley, in which he animadverted on the arrangements of the Hinckley post office in respect of sanitary accommodation for the clerks and for the postmaster's household, in respect of space for the staff and for the public, and in respect of ventilation; whether it has been admitted by the Surveyor to the Post Office that the present building is insufficient for the postal needs of a manufacturing town of 12,000 inhabitants, and whether he is aware that, after representations had been made to the Postmaster General on the subject several years ago, a site was actually acquired by him in a suitable position for a new post office; and whether he can give any assurance that the matter will be further inquired into, and the erection of a new and commodious post office proceeded with.

MR. HANBURY: Attention has been called to the report in question, and it is admitted that the present post office at Hinckley is insufficient. A site was purchased last year and plans for a new building have been prepared and are under consideration. The erection of the building will be proceeded with as soon as practicable.

POSTAL DELAYS IN THE METROPOLIS.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that a large number of letters posted in the E.C. district on 30th June were not delivered in the N.W., N.E., W., and S.W. districts till various times between twelve and two o'clock on the 2nd instant, although the letters, having been posted in the metropolitan area, were understood to be unaffected by the recent postal changes for letters to and from the provinces; and whether, if the delay is due to the recent alterations in the postal arrangements, he can state why the irregularities have lasted over a period so much longer than was expected, and how much longer it will be before they may be expected to cease.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General is not aware that a large number of letters were delayed as stated by the hon. Member; but it is known that a large number of prospectuses, notices of sales, etc., handed in at the General Post Office and at Mount Pleasant on Saturday the 30th ultimo, were kept over for delivery on Monday morning the 2nd instant. Such a course is sometimes unavoidable, especially at the turn of the half year. Letters for delivery in the metropolitan area which are posted in the Eastern Central district in a box marked "London," are not affected by the recent change.

MR. COHEN: My information is that it was not the prospectuses which were delayed, but sealed letters containing cheques. May I suggest that the sorting work should be done by——

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now making a speech.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the delays in the transmission of letters between the metropolis and some parts of the country; whether complaints have been made as to the inconvenience thus caused to business men; and whether he will take immediate steps to restore some measure of regularity.

MR. HANBURY: Yes, Sir; this matter has been engaging the Postmaster General's very careful attention, and he has good reason to believe that the steps taken with the view of restoring regularity in the service have proved successful.

COOTEHILL (CAVAN) POSTMASTERSHIP.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG (Cavan, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he can state the qualifications of Mr. Armstrong for appointment as postmaster in Cootehill, county Cavan; whether, although following the occupation of a druggist, he was appointed over the heads of candidates of long experience in the postal service; and seeing that Mr. Armstrong's predecessor was obliged to give up all other occupations, whether Mr. Armstrong has also been required to devote his entire time to official work.

MR. HANBURY: Mr. Armstrong was reported to be fully competent to discharge the duties of sub-postmaster. It was considered necessary to appoint a man in order that efficient control should be maintained over the twelve established and auxiliary postmen attached to the office, and none of the four post office servants who applied for the appointment were suitable, three being women and the fourth an unestablished officer who does not reside at Cootehill. It is not intended to require Mr. Armstrong to relinquish his private business.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG: Was not Mr. Armstrong's predecessor a grocer who was required to devote the whole of his time to the work of the office?

MR. HANBURY: I am told that that is not the case.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): Was the last holder of the office a lady?

MR. HANBURY: Yes.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION IN COUNTY CAVAN.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, having regard to the fact that in autumn last a guarantee was given for extending the telegraphic communication to Shercock, county Cavan, whether he can state the reason for the delay in having the work accomplished.

MR. HANBURY: By the time that those concerned definitely communicated their decision to give a guarantee the sum of money voted by Parliament for telegraph extensions in last financial year was exhausted, and the Postmaster General had no alternative but to explain that the work could not be put in hand until after the end of March in the current year. Unfortunately in that month the post office at Shercock became vacant, and one of the guarantors—the mother of the late sub-postmistress—had to be released from the guarantee. The case is, therefore, in abeyance pending the execution of a fresh guarantee.

GRANTS FOR NEW SCHOOLS IN NORTH SLIGO.

MR. O'DOWD (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord

Lieutenant of Ireland in view of the fact that the Government grant for the erection of a new national school in Ireland amounts to a sum equal to two-thirds of the estimated cost of the building, the remaining portion being supposed to come from local sources, and that in certain congested districts in Ireland this local levy cannot be raised owing to the poverty of the people, the consequence being that much needed schools, including those of Rockfield and Rathbarrow, in North Sligo, remain unbuilt, to the detriment of primary education in Ireland, whether the Government will consider the advisability of increasing the grants for the erection of schools in these districts.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): I have received no representations on this subject from the Commissioners of National Education, and in the absence of any such representations I am not in a position to consider the question.

IRISH DISPENSARY MEDICAL DOCTORS.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether his attention has been directed to a resolution unanimously adopted by the board of guardians at Banbridge, county Down, on the 28th ult., which sought the amendment of the law upon the subject of the appointment of dispensary medical officers in Ireland, in order that each doctor should provide and pay for the services of a locum tenens in all cases of his own absence, and whether he will give his favourable consideration to the suggestion.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The resolution referred to has been received; but I do not think the suggestion contained in it could be adopted with advantage.

COLERAINE WORKHOUSE—RELIGIOUS INSTRUCTION TO CHILDREN.

MR. SAMUEL YOUNG: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that some months ago two children of a man named Roger O'Brien were placed in the Coleraine workhouse, that they were shortly after their birth baptised as Roman Catholics, and that they have since been registered as Protestants in the books of the workhouse; whether these children will be delivered over to their father, who has applied for them, if he undertakes to support them; and by whom, and under what authority, and when, their religion was changed from Catholic to Protestant in the books of the workhouse at Coleraine.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The putative father of these children is, I understand, a Roman Catholic, whilst their mother, who died in January last, was a Protestant. The two elder children were, it appears, baptised as Protestants and the two younger as Roman Catholics. The board of guardians at their meeting held on the 10th February, having before them the opinion of counsel, resolved that the religious registration of the younger children in the workhouse books should be altered from Roman Catholic to that of Irish Church. I am unable to reply to the second paragraph; the matter is one for the guardians themselves to deal with.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Have the Government no power to interfere with these attempts at proselytism?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The matter lies entirely in the hands of the guardians.

PROCLAIMED MEETING AT NEWMARKET.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state on what grounds a public meeting announced to be held in Newmarket, county Cork, on 3rd June, to be addressed by the Parliamentary representative of the division and other speakers, was proclaimed; and can he state how many officers and men of the Royal Irish Constabulary were called in to enforce the proclamation, and from what source the expense involved is to be defrayed.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This meeting, which was convened under the auspices of the United Irish League, was proclaimed because the Government had reason to believe that it was intended to denounce and intimidate a particular individual who is in occupation of an evicted farm in the neighbourhood. The force of police present consisted of 4 officers and 150 men. Any additional expense involved by their employment will be defrayed from the Constabulary Vote.

MR. FLYNN: On what ground had the Government "reason to believe"?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: We had a sworn information to the effect I have stated.

MR. FLYNN: Sworn by whom?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The district inspector.

MR. FLAVIN: Has the right hon. Gentleman knowledge of the fact that the meeting was held notwithstanding the proclamation?

ANÆSTHETICS IN BELFAST ROYAL HOSPITAL.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can give any particulars to the House regarding the case of a man named George Dover, who died at the Belfast Royal Hospital, on 7th June ultimo, under an anæsthetic, and will he explain why no inquest was held in this case to ascertain if the anæsthetic which proved fatal had been properly administered, while on the same day an inquest was held on another hospital case in which the jury returned a verdict of death from natural causes; is he aware that the Town Clerk of Belfast, at the instance of the Finance Committee of the City Council, asked for an explanation of this matter from the coroner, who replied that the only person entitled to demand explanations from him was the Lord Chancellor; and will he take steps to draw the attention of the Lord Chancellor to this case.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I understand that the coroner, in the exercise of the discretion vested in him, decided that it was unnecessary to hold an inquest in the case of George Dover, whilst in the second case referred to he found it imperatively necessary to hold an inquest. It is open to any of the parties interested to bring the action of the coroner under the notice of the Lord Chancellor. He is not an officer of the Executive, and the Government see no reason for intervening as suggested in the last paragraph.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Was an explanation demanded by the Lord Chancellor?

LIGHT RAILWAYS.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he state what amount, if any, of the money voted by Parliament, namely, £1,000,000, for building light railways in Ireland, is now available for that purpose, and also what amount, if any, is now available out of the £250,000 voted for free grants.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The figures are not accurately stated in the question, but I may observe that none of the money provided by Parliament for the construction of light railways in Ireland is now available for further railway projects.

"PADDY THE WAD."

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that an employee of Lord Kenmare, locally known as Paddy the Wad, who was sentenced to twenty years penal servitude for kicking an old woman to death in the district of Killarney, has been released from prison; and can he state what term of actual imprisonment did this man undergo after his sentence and up to the time of his release, and on what grounds and on whose recommendation he was released.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Patrick Brosnan, to whom the question refers, was convicted at the Munster Winter Assizes, 1894, of the manslaughter of a woman, and sentenced to twenty years penal servitude. His term of actual imprisonment amounted to nearly two years. He was released in November, 1896, on the ground of health, upon a report furnished by the medical officers of the prison, which was concurred in by the medical member of the Prisons Board.

MR. FLAVIN: What was the matter with the gentleman's health? Were there any other reasons for his release?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have said he was released on the ground of health.

SYLVESTER DWYER.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state on what date was Sylvester Dwyer, now a prisoner in Maryborough Gaol, convicted, and what was the sentence imposed on him; and can he say for how long Dwyer has now been in prison.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: This prisoner was convicted of a Whiteboy offence at the Cork Winter Assizes on the 10th January, 1888, and sentenced to eighteen years penal servitude. He was in custody awaiting trial from the 9th April in the previous year, so that he has been in prison over thirteen years.

MR. FLAVIN: Why was not the same clemency extended to this man as to Lord Kenmare's bailiff?

MR. COGHILL (Stoke-upon-Trent): Will Dwyer, after his imprisonment is over, be appointed to an office under the Irish Executive?

R.I.C.—MARRIAGE REGULATIONS.

MR. T. J. FARRELL (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state what are the Constabulary regulations in connection with members of the police force who get married in the district in which they are stationed; and whether it is usual to allow constables to continue to do duty for lengthened periods in the districts in which they have family associations and connections.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Members of the force, on becoming connected by marriage in the county in which they are stationed, are liable to transfer to another county. In some cases, however, where it is manifest that the interests of the public service would not suffer by a relaxation of the rule, it is not enforced.

DRAPERS' COMPANY'S ESTATES IN COUNTY DERRY.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants of the Drapers' Company's estate, county Derry, who recently purchased their holdings under the Land Purchase Acts, had turbary rights, extending sixty years back, on the Cullion Mountain, and that these rights were recognised since the tenants purchased their holdings, and up to February last, when the Drapers' Company sold the bog to two tenants on another estate, who are now preventing the tenants from cutting turf; and whether the Land Commission will take any action to secure the turbary rights, which the tenants claim to have enjoyed for so long in this bog, and which rights the tenants claim they purchased with their holdings from the Drapers' Company.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The Land Commissioners have no information as to special turbary rights on Cullion Mountain, and no reference was made to turbary rights in the agreements for sale. The Commissioners have no jurisdiction to take the action suggested; the tenant purchasers can proceed before the ordinary tribunals to enforce any rights which they may have as appurtenant to their holdings.

DUBLIN POLICE UNIFORMS.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the contract system for the uniform and clothing of the Dublin Police and of the Royal Irish Constabulary is under the control of the War Department; and whether, seeing that the organisation of the Royal Irish Constabulary is not under the control of the War Office in any other department, he will consider the advisability of instituting a clothing department in Ireland.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The contracts for clothing for the Constabulary are made through the War Department. Contracts for the Dublin Metropolitan Police are made through the Chief Commissioner. In both cases, however, the cloth is required to undergo the War Department tests, and in both cases also the tailoring is done in Ireland. In answer to the second paragraph I must refer to my reply on Tuesday last to the question of the hon. Member for North Louth on the same subject.*

MR. FLYNN: Could not the War Office deposit a specimen of the cloth in Dublin, so that Irish manufacturers may see it?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Samples of the cloth have been sent to Irish manufacturers.

* See p. 413 of this volume.

HOSPITAL (LIMERICK) PETTY SESSIONS CLERKSHIP.

MR. AUSTIN (Limerick, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a vacancy exists in the clerkship of the petty sessions district of Hospital in the county of Limerick; will he state under what circumstances magistrates are entitled to vote for the filling up of the vacancy; and will the Crown take the necessary steps to ensure that magistrates who have not qualified themselves by the legal attendance at petty sessions will record their votes at the election.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There is a vacancy for a petty sessions clerk in the district mentioned. Magistrates only are entitled to vote who, being resident in the petty sessions district for which the election of clerk is held, are justices of the county in which said district is situated; or who, though not resident in the district, are in the habit of attending and acting as justices at the petty sessions court thereof. As a general rule, which, however, is subject to modification where exceptional circumstances exist, a magistrate cannot be considered as having been in the habit of attending and acting as justice at the petty sessions court, who has not attended at least four times in each of the three years next preceding the election, if he has been so long in the commission of the peace. After the election the names of the magistrates who have voted, with their qualifications to vote, are submitted to the Lord Lieutenant, who decides as to the right of each justice to record his vote.

LORD RATHDONNEL'S TENANTS.

MR. MACALEESE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that in the matter of Section 47 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, and of Lord Rathdonnel, landlord, Margaret M'Manus, former tenant, in the case of an application made in October, 1896, to the Land Commission to act as mediators under Section 47 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, and where the landlord failed to lodge his objection thereto within the prescribed time, and did not in fact do so until the 5th February, 1897, the Land Commission, by an order dated the 23rd July, 1897, ordered that the landlord's notice of objection should be dealt with as served within the prescribed time; whether the Land Commission have power to make such order; and whether, if the landlord is prevented by disability from lodging his objection, it is competent for the Land Commission to receive it from another person.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The ruling of the Land Commission in the case in question, which has been the subject of much legal controversy, has been upheld on appeal to the House of Lords.

RESULT FEES IN IRISH SCHOOLS.

MR. GILHOOLY (Cork County, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state what is the amount of the deficit in the results for the year 1899 in District 58; and what effect such deficit will have on the future income of the teachers of this district.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have referred this question to the Commissioners of National Education, who state that the matter is engaging their attention.

PROCEDURE OF COUNCILS ORDER.

MR. CLANCY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, in reference to the Local Government (Ireland) (No. 2) Bill, whether he will follow the precedent set in the case of the Local Government (Ireland) Bill, 1898, and lay upon the Table of the House a draft of the alteration of the Procedure of Councils Order which, in addition to those recommended by county councils, the Local Government Board for Ireland intend to make if they acquire the power.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The answer to this question is in the negative. The Bill merely gives permissive powers, and the Local Government Board have no cut-and-dried scheme of alteration. I may say, however, that no alteration would be likely to be proposed without giving the county councils concerned an opportunity of considering and expressing their opinion upon it.

COUNTY KERRY FISHERY PIERS.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will bring to the notice of the Congested Districts Board the need for the construction of fishery piers at Dunkin and Ventry, county Kerry.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKETT, Dublin Co., S.): The suggestion in this question will be brought under the notice of the Congested Districts Board at its next meeting on the 13th instant.

IRISH CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD —REPRESENTATION OF CO. KERRY.

SIR THOMAS ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the Congested Districts Board will consider the advisability of adding to their number a representative of the county of Kerry.

MR. PLUNKETT: The number of members of the Congested Districts Board is fixed by statute, and there is no vacancy on the Board at present.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Will the case of Munster be considered when a vacancy occurs?

MR. PLUNKETT: That is not a question for me.

POTATO BLIGHT.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Board of Agriculture and Technical Instruction for Ireland whether he is aware that potato blight has already made its appearance in certain districts in Ireland; and whether it is proposed to take any, and is so, what steps with a view to prevent the spread of the disease should occasion arise.

MR. PLUNKETT: The heavy rains during the past month in Ireland have unfortunately been unfavourable to the potato crop, but so far I have not received any official information as to the appearance of blight. In view of the condition of the weather, the Department communicated to the public press throughout the country on the 20th June, a circular letter drawing attention to the danger of disease in the potato crop, and impressing on farmers the great necessity for taking action at once for the prevention of blight by carefully spraying their crops. Large numbers of leaflets containing directions on the subject of spraying have also been distributed, and placards on the same subject are about to be extensively posted up in conspicuous places throughout the country. The matter will continue to be carefully watched by the Department.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Is it the intention of the Department to carry out any experiments with a view to discovering the best remedy for the potato disease?

MR. PLUNKETT: Experiments have been carried out in Ireland for the last three or four years in order to find out the best means of combating the disease.

HOUSE OF LORDS CLERKSHIPS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury is he aware that the post of third or reading clerk at the Table of the House of Lords has been vacant for nearly one year; has he any reason to believe that the two clerks now at the Table find a difficulty in doing the work hitherto done by three; if there be no such difficulty, will Her Majesty's Government consider the propriety of abolishing the post of reading clerk; if, on the other hand, there be such a difficulty, will he explain why there has been so long a delay in filling up the post; and will the Vote for the House of Lords Offices be put down for a day when it can be discussed; if so, on what day.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no reason to believe that there is any great inconvenience caused by the delay in filling this post.

WELSH SUNDAY CLOSING BILL.

MR. MACLEAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that the Standing Committee on Law was unable, after waiting an hour, to form a quorum on Tuesday to discuss the Welsh Sunday Closing Bill, although a number of Members had been expressly added to the Committee for the purpose of taking this Bill into consideration; whether he has been informed that not a single representative of the Government was present on the occasion to tell the Committee whether the Bill will be proceeded with this session or not; and whether the Government will now state if it intends to pass the Bill into law this session so as to save the time of the members of the Standing Committee on Law.

MR. ALFRED THOMAS (Glamorganshire, E.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers the question, I wish to ask whether he is aware that there is a very strong feeling in Wales in favour of the passing of the Bill?

MR. MACLEAN: Is the right hon. Gentleman also aware that there is a very strong feeling in Wales against the passing of the Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information as to the position of the Standing Committee on Law, nor have I any official means of obtaining such information. As to the second part of the question, it would not be the business of any member of the Government at present on the Committee to announce the policy of the Government with regard to the allocation of time for the remainder of the session. I have already stated that it is impossible to give such privileges as are desired to contentious private Bills. The statements of these two Members prove that this is a controversial measure.

INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. MACLEAN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can now state when he proposes to take the Indian Budget.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think I can add anything to what I said on Tuesday as to this matter.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: What will the business be on Monday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We must go on with the Tithes Bill until it is finished. I hope it will be finished to-night, and in that event we shall take the Agricultural Holdings Bill on Monday.

MILITARY MANŒUVRES BILL [Lords].

Ordered, That the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills do examine the Military Manœuvres Bill [Lords], with respect to compliance with the Standing Orders relative to Private Bills.—(Mr. Wyndham.)

SIEGE OF LADYSMITH—DISAPPEARANCE OF STORES—SIR C. DILKE AND SIR W. STOKES—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

*SIR C. DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I wish, by leave of the House, to make a very brief personal explanation with regard to a matter which was debated in the House last week. In a London daily paper yesterday there appeared a long telegram from Sir William Stokes, consulting surgeon to Her Majesty's field force in South Africa, which was copied into several London evening papers and into a large number of provincial papers with sensational headings. In that telegram Sir William Stokes says, "Sir Charles Dilke's charge of robbing stores is absolutely devoid and destitute of foundation." That was a charge made by me in the House, and it was a charge which I believe is admitted. It rests not only on private, but on official, data, and I have on two occasions asked in this House for the production of the minutes of the court-martial which was held with regard to the robbery of stores at Intombi Camp. These minutes have not yet been given to the House. It is evident that it is to Intombi Camp that Sir William Stokes refers, because the next words are these: "Intombi Camp was no doubt unhealthy." I wish to assure the House that I did not ask the questions in reference to this matter until I had taken every possible means to assure myself of the truth of the statements which had been made to me, and that I am prepared entirely to stand by the statements I made in the debate. At the end of his letter Sir William Stokes again refers to me by name, and says that the charges made were "as unjustifiable as they were cruel and unpatriotic." I could, I think, ask the House to treat those words as a breach of privilege, but it is not my intention to do so under the circumstances of the case, as an inquiry is to take place. With regard to the charge of want of patriotism, it appears to me to be a patriotic duty to bring such matters before the House.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL AND MEDICAL ARRANGEMENTS—MR BURDETT-COUTTS'S CHARGES—COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY.

[MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT.]

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton) rose in his place, and asked leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance—namely, "the composition and the scope of the reference to the Committee to be appointed to inquire into the treatment of sick and wounded British soldiers in South Africa"; but the pleasure of the House not having been signified, Mr. SPEAKER called on those Members who supported the motion to rise in their places, and not less than forty Members having accordingly risen:—

MR. LABOUCHERE: I do not want to go into what has already passed, but it will be within the recollection of the House that last week a letter from the hon. Member for Westminster appeared in The Times in regard to the treatment of British soldiers in South Africa, and especially with regard to their treatment in the hospital at Bloemfontein. The letter naturally attracted considerable attention, and the First Lord of the Treasury was asked whether he would find some opportunity for the House to discuss the matter. The right hon. Gentleman very fairly agreed to put down on Friday last a nominal Vote for the Medical Department of the War Office in order that a discussion might take place. The discussion then took place, and, so far as I understood it, the Under Secretary of State for War did not traverse in the main the statements made by the hon. Member for Westminster; he practically admitted that in the main they were correct, although in some cases there was, perhaps, a certain amount of misconception and exaggeration. With regard to the Cape, the hon. Member for Westminster, in his speech rather than in his letter, stated certain facts, which were met by the Under Secretary saying that the War Office had complied with every demand made upon them by the local authorities, and at the same time he stated that a very large number of telegrams had passed between the local authorities at the Cape, both medical and military, and the War Office. I asked whether he would submit those telegrams to the House, and he declined to do so. With regard to Bloemfontein, the defence was that of military necessity, that the troops were advancing, that the matter was within the discretion of Lord Roberts, and that Lord Roberts no doubt would be responsible if any person were responsible. In fact, we were jeered at; we were taunted with trying to attack the Government under the pretence of attacking Lord Roberts. That is the past history of the case. Before the debate the right hon. Gentleman agreed to appoint a Committee, and, as he stated this evening, to appoint it at the request of Lord Roberts. I would point out that it was not alone at the request of Lord Roberts that that Committee was wanted. The request was made by the hon. Member for Westminster; it was supported not only by Members on this side of the House but by a good many on the other, and certainly there was such a strong feeling throughout the country at the revelations made by the hon. Member for Westminster that there was a universal opinion that some sort of inquiry or investigation ought to be made. This evening the right hon. Gentleman has told us what the composition of the Committee is. He tells us it is to be a small Committee, that it is to consist of three persons. The first is Dr. Church, a medical gentleman; the second is Professor Cunningham, an anatomist; and the third is Lord Justice Romer. That hardly meets the requirements of Lord Roberts. Lord Roberts is afraid of there being too many doctors, and he asks that besides two or three doctors—[AN HON. MEMBER: One or two.]—he says, "Besides one or two doctors, let us have some men of common sense." Far be it from me to say that Lord Justice Romer is not a man of eminent common sense; but still he is only one, and, with all respect to Lord Justice Romer, he is an eminent legal Chancery lawyer, and he is not what I should call a man of business. ["Oh, oh!"] I draw a distinction between a lawyer and a man of business. A lawyer may be a man of business, but it is not his speciality; the lawyer's speciality is to make money over quarrels about other people's business. But, anyway, Lord Justice Romer is only one, and I think the House will understand what I mean when I say that we want men on this Committee who are practical men, who are engaged in business, who are men of sound common sense, and by whom we shall have a sound, thorough, businesslike investigation, and a Report upon the results of that investigation. I cannot understand why we are to have two doctors on this Committee. Sir William Stokes has defended the doctors; Sir William Stokes has accused my right hon. friend and others of uttering untruths. Members of a profession are always inclined to stand by their profession. When it a question which seriously affects the whole medical profession, and embraces so large a field as this inquiry ought to embrace, surely we ought not to have two medical men on the Commission forming a majority of the Committee. It seems to me somewhat remarkable that the Government should take upon themselves the appointment of the members of that Committee, and decide upon the reference which is to be put to them, without any consultation with the House of Commons. According to all constitutional doctrines the Ministry is absolutely responsible for what goes on, and they are directly responsible to this House. Whoever heard of gentlemen who are, to all intents and purposes, the defendants in the case, appointing their own jury? The House ought to have some sort of control in this matter. The appeal was made to the House of Commons, and we cannot shirk or avoid our responsibility. The House of Commons ought to have a voice in the matter as to what the reference is to be, and also in the composition of the Committee. The general usage is that their names should be submitted in some sort of way to the House of Commons. We know what takes place when a Committee of this House is appointed. The names are first submitted to us, and the House decides whether it accepts them or not, and it may change a name, and urge that this or that gentleman should be added if it thinks fit. If this Committee is to secure the confidence of the country, there must not be a majority of medical men upon it, and the House having been appealed to by the hon. Member for Westminster, and a discussion having taken place upon this subject, it is perfectly illusory to have such a discussion unless the House has some voice in the composition and reference of this Committee. I do not say for a moment that the Government are guilty, or that any particular person is guilty. I am aware of the great misery and suffering which is always involved in war; but there is certainly a primâ facie case that the sufferings might have been mitigated had there been more care shown either by the Government or by their officials, and I do not fix the responsibility upon any particular person. We have the fact before us that a most horrible state of things existed at Bloemfontein, and that even at Cape Town it had been shown that there was not a sufficient number of nurses or orderlies. It appears from what was stated that even in a simple case like the provision of bandages for the wounded they would not have been able to obtain them had it not been for the fact that there happened to be a considerable number of bandages in the hands of a private firm. I have moved the adjournment of the House in order that the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury may have an opportunity of doing what I think he is bound to do under the circumstances, and that is to take an early opportunity of giving the House an occasion to express its views upon the reference to and the composition of this Committee. If the right hon. Gentleman does not do that, then I hope hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House at all events, and even some hon Members on the other side, will register by their votes their protest against the course which has been adopted.

*Mr. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): In seconding the motion of the hon. Member for Northampton I desire to say that I take this course without any previous arrangement with the hon. Member. I do not think that it is unreasonable, under the circumstances, for me to ask to be heard on this subject. I object, in the first place, to one name as being that of a gentleman who ought not to be on such a Committee when the responsibility of the Army Medical Department is directly attacked. I would remind the House that I have not myself attempted to localise the responsibility for what I saw in South Africa; but of course the Army Medical Department must necessarily be largely implicated in the question. The hon. Member for Northampton has called attention to the curious divergence of the composition of this Committee from the expressed wish of Lord Roberts. Lord Roberts's words were, "a small Committee, consisting of one or two medical men of recognised ability, in whom the public have full confidence, with some men of sound common sense." I ask whether a Committee which has a majority of medical men upon it is a Committee framed in accordance with the desire of Lord Roberts? I object to this Committee because it has that majority of medical men. The difficulty of arriving at an accurate opinion with regard to what has taken place in South Africa from medical sources has, I believe, already been illustrated in the case which was the only precedent we have for such a Committee. That was at the time of the Crimea, when the letters of the present Sir William Howard Russell awoke the country to the true state of things, and a Committee of this House was appointed to inquire into the case. When those letters appeared, describing, in terms singularly like those I have myself felt compelled to publish, the inefficiency of the medical arrangements in the Crimea, the chief medical authority on the spot, Sir George Brown, was going about in this country saying that everything was absolutely perfect. There are many other analogies between this case and that. Mr. Roebuck brought the matter before the House. A Parliamentary committee was appointed and Mr. Roebuck, the chief accuser of the medical arrangements in the Crimea, was appointed chairman of that committee. The House will remember that the Aberdeen Ministry went out on that proposal, but Lord Palmerston came in, and he accepted the Committee. I know what the answer to this will be. I shall be told that at the same time a Sanitary Commission of three was appointed, two being doctors and one what was called an engineering member, to go out to the Crimea. But the object of that Commission was not to inquire into what had happened, but to at once take in hand the bettering of the arrangements on the spot. Therefore, of course, it was composed of experts. There was another serious difference between that Commission and the present one. That Commission was appointed not by the Government which defended the medical arrangements in the Crimea, but by the Government which came in on the strength of accepting the fact that those arrangements were insufficient. I desire to ask the House, which I think is always generous to an individual, to consider for a moment the curious position in which I myself am placed. I can assure the House that I would not call attention to this if I did not think that some slight consideration of it on the part of the Government would really facilitate the cause we all have at heart, and that is getting at the truth of this matter. What is my position upon this question? I made certain statements in the press. Those statements I repeated in the House and added to them other statements, which together constituted a grave indictment of the medical arrangements in South Africa. That placed me in the position of a plaintiff; but the thing has turned round, and now I am in the position of a defendant—defending the accuracy of my statements, and what I believe to be the great interests involved in proving their truth, if they are true. I know what the Government will say. The Government will say that they will call me as a witness and enable me to state my case. They may possibly say they will accept my suggestion of other witnesses who should be called. But is that enough in this case? Is it not the usual practice that a man placed in my position should have the right to watch the case on his own behalf? Has he not the right to put what questions he likes to witnesses, and to cross-examine all the witnesses? I daresay that some skilful dialectician on the front bench will find flaws in this analogy, but to me it seems to be close enough for my purpose. My facts have been questioned. Of that I make no complaint. But my motives have been bitterly attacked, not in the country, not in the press, but in a more influential, though more limited circle. I had no motive, no shadow nor shred of any motive or reason, for making these statements except my determination that they should be made public, because I knew that by that means, and that means alone, could we obtain a reform of that terrible condition of things. That is my position, and with my facts questioned and my motives attacked I put it to the House whether some claims do not arise out of that position—some claims to me with regard to this Committee. I do not ask that those claims should be considered. I do not wish to put them forward, and I am quite willing to lose sight of all personal considerations, if the Government will allow me to co-operate with them to a certain extent in enabling this Committee to get at the truth of the matter at issue. My suggestion briefly is that I should be permitted to suggest to the Government a name for them to add to the Committee. I promise to suggest the name of one whose impartiality, ability, and qualifications cannot possibly be questioned. I have waited day by day in the hope that I might receive some communication from Her Majesty's Government on the subject. If the absence of any wish that I should co-operate with them in this matter is due to an assumption on the part of the Government that they are on one side and I am on the other—an idea which can only be based on another assumption that the medical arrangements in South Africa are perfect, or as perfect as possible—then I deplore that I, as a loyal member of the party for fifteen years, am placed in that position, but I put aside personal considerations and personal ties to my party, and I say that the logical outcome of that position, if the Government are on one side and I am on the other, is that one side is appointing the judges to try the issue. I deplore it if that position should arise. I do not believe for a moment that the Government would wish such a position to be set up. I do not believe that they would perpetrate a personal injustice, but I must say for myself that, considering the experience I have had of this particular subject, and the knowledge I have gained of all its branches, I should be in a position to facilitate the inquiries by the course I have suggested.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."—(Mr. Labouchere.)

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I confess at once that I share to the full the disappointment that has been expressed by the two hon. Members who have spoken at the constitution of this Committee. But at the same time I am most anxious that we should, if possible, avoid the bringing in of anything like party recrimination or party feeling in the matter, and that we should not present to the world at large the spectacle, apparently, of the Government unwilling to give a full inquiry as alleged by their opponents, and their opponents clamouring for a fuller inquiry in the face of the Government. I do not think that that would be a seemly position for the House of Commons to take up in a matter which we all admit to be so grave, and a matter which affects so deeply the feelings and sentiments of a large part of the population of this country. The point that strikes me as most unfortunate is that which has been referred to—namely, that there is not a sufficient representation of ordinary laymen—that there is, in fact, none at all if you exclude a judge from the category of laymen. There are two eminent doctors, of whom most of us have nothing to say, for the simple reason that I am afraid the great majority of us do not know much about them; but I take it for granted from their position—one academical, the other in his profession—that they are capable and competent men, and also that they are high-minded, straightforward men, who would do their duty while in such a capacity. I make no doubt of that. Besides them there is only an eminent judge; but what is wanted, surely, of all things, is what my hon. friend spoke of as the man of business, or, rather, the business man—a man accustomed to bring his common-sense and experience of life and affairs to bear upon such problems and difficulties as no doubt have presented themselves in South Africa. There are many men of that kind who could be obtained, and whose positions and character before the country would secure the complete confidence of public opinion. Let me point out also that this is not a mere question of the technicalities of the medical profession. There is the whole question of transport and of the power of organising relief in such a case as this, upon which surely it is most desirable to get the opinion of men qualified to give that opinion. A number of names occur at once of men who, if they would undertake this patriotic duty, would, I am sure, satisfy the mind of the country and give solidity to the Commission, and secure that success for it which I am afraid it will not secure if it is constituted as proposed. I venture to appeal to the right hon. Gentleman. I have said that I have the strongest possible wish not to appear as if we were fighting with each other on a matter such as this, where the character of the country stands at stake before the world. It is also a matter which touches the hearts and feelings of many people who have relatives there, or may in the future have relatives undergoing the chances of war in South Africa or in other parts of the world. Will the right hon. Gentleman not listen to what I would put forward, even as a friendly appeal, if he will allow me to say so—namely, that two Members should be added to the Committee, and that those two should be chosen not from any party purpose or on account of any prejudice they may be supposed to have? On the contrary, they should be men who are least likely to have prejudices, but competent men with that priceless quality, common sense, to which Lord Roberts alluded. I do not know any test, I am bound to say, except the test of their past record and their character in the eyes of the country. If two men of that character were added to this Commission, I am certain there would be a great feeling of relief throughout the country. But if that is not done, and if we are to have two doctors, however eminent, and a judge, however eminent, and nobody else, then the feeling of disappointment will be great, and I am afraid the chances of a successful result will be small.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): I would wish to say a few words on this motion, and the tone of the remarks of the right hon. Gentleman opposite enables me to do so. I feel deeply concerned in this matter. In my early youth I was a witness of terrible scenes in the army before Sebastopol, owing to disease and insufficient preparation. It was reported by the Medical Commissioners that 50 per cent. of the regiments engaged in the siege had died of disease in six months. Thank God we have had nothing like that at the present time; but there is great reason to believe that the best use has not been made of the means placed at the disposal of the authorities in South Africa by Her Majesty's Government. I believe ample provision had been made, that nothing had been stinted, but I believe sufficient use was not always made of it. Letters by the last mail from South Africa, the truth of which I cannot doubt, showed some shortcomings. The state of several hospitals near Cape Town, and of hospitals in other parts of the country, showed that insufficient use had been made of the supplies, forming, in fact, a very heavy indictment against the Army Medical Department which required to be thoroughly investigated. There was, it is charged, a reluctance on the part of the medical officers to call for things necessary for the comfort and well-being of the sick, who, even within the last few weeks, had been lying in a miserable state and without proper shelter in places where there was no difficulty as regards transport. We have all heard of it; the newspapers are full of these cases. I admit that some of them may be exaggerated, but I am convinced that there is foundation for others, and that an inquiry which would command public confidence is required as to whether the best use had been made of the means provided by the Government with, I believe, lavish hands. I should like to avoid inconveniencing Her Majesty's Government in any way, but I think the inquiry should be one in which the public would have full confidence, and that men of common sense are required on it besides doctors.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): The Government have been attacked by three gentlemen for three quite distinct offences in connection with the appointment of this Commission. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton, who moved the adjournment of the House, invented an entirely new constitutional principle which, with all the zeal of a discoverer, he expatiated upon in his observations. The hon. Member thinks that the Commission ought not to be appointed by the Government, but ought to be practically appointed by the House of Commons. It is a new doctrine, and one to which I noticed, with pleasure, the right hon. Gentleman opposite did not subscribe. It is one which was never practised by the party opposite, or by the party to which I belong, and for which, I believe, there is no precedent whatever. Of course, this House has a voice in regard to all that pertains to its own Committees. The reference is submitted to the House, and can be amended; and the names are submitted, and can be objected to or approved. But that practice is without precedent or example in the case of Commissions of this kind.

MR. LABOUCHERE: There are many Commissions appointed by Act of Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman never suggested an Act of Parliament. An Act of Parliament must be submitted to this House and the other House, and go through all the formalities of the Legislature. A statutory Commission is on a quite different footing from ordinary Commissions, to which this belongs. Such Commissions have never been submitted to the House of Commons in the way the hon. Gentleman suggests, and I trust that, for the convenience of Parliamentary procedure and the preservation of the responsibility of the Government, this well-recognised principle will never be departed from. That point practically exhausted the hon. Gentleman's criticism. He did indeed say that the Government are the accused parties in this matter; and that therefore they ought not to appoint the judges in their own case. But I beg to inform the hon. Gentleman that the Government are not the accused parties. When I suggested the other day that there was an attempt to drag in the Government and to make a party question of it I was met with loud cries of "No, no," and of general repudiation from gentlemen on that side of the House. I leave the hon. Member for Northampton, who moved the motion for adjournment, and turn to the speech of the hon. gentlemen who seconded it. I do not quite apprehend the object of the hon. Gentleman's speech, unless it was to suggest that he should himself be the man of sound common sense for whom Lord Roberts asks and who, according to the critics of the Commission and of the Government, is not to be found adequately represented on the Commission as it is constituted. The hon. Gentleman said that he found himself placed in a position of great difficulty. I am sorry that my hon. friend should be placed in such a position. But if he is so placed—and I do not know why he should think that he is—surely he himself is the only person who has placed him there. He tells us that he has been attacked as to his facts and his motives. I do not know who has attacked him as to his facts or as to his motives. I am perfectly certain he cannot quote a single phrase or suggestion made by anyone on this bench attacking either his facts or his motives.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I considered it an attack upon my motives to convert the statement of facts which I made into an attack upon Lord Roberts.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman indeed criticised somebody, and who that could be unless it is the responsible officers in the field we were unable to discover, and the hon. Gentleman has been unable to explain.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I did not criticise anybody. I criticised a state of things.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is no such thing as criticising a state of things. You may describe a state of things, but you cannot criticise a state of things.

*MR. BURDETT-COUTTS: I am extremely sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman again, but I must ask him, in his own words, where or when I criticised any person, and who that person was?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My complaint against the hon. Gentleman is exactly that his criticisms were all of this vague and obscure character. If he was merely narrating a very tragic and deplorable state of things without suggesting that blame existed anywhere, he was really wasting the time of the House of Commons. It is only because the blame must rest somewhere, and in order that that blame may be brought home to the proper quarters—it is only on that hypothesis that it was legitimate to bring forward this heartrending description at all. I am not aware that the hon. Gentleman made any secret of the fact that he thought that in the organisation of the advance to Bloemfontein and Kroonstad there had been mistakes made as to the transport arrangements for which someone was to blame. But I return to the hon. Gentleman's speech. Nobody here has attacked his facts or his motives. But if everybody whose motives are criticised or whose facts are attacked is to form part of the Commission or is to be consulted as to its constitution, it is evident that the task of the Government would be never ending; and we should have to consult not only the hon. Gentleman, but the many eminent persons with whom he has come into conflict in this controversy. It is evident that they cannot all be members of the Commission; and that if they were they would be much more occupied in fighting among themselves than in investigating the charges committed to them. But the hon. Gentleman appears to think that we have shown an almost callous disregard of his feelings. I hope that we are not open to that charge; but the fact is that I did not in this matter consider the hon. Gentleman one way or the other. In constituting the Committee I did not think of the hon. Member at all from the beginning to the end of the business. I hope it does not show a hard and callous heart on my part, but that is the fact. The hon. Gentleman, in accordance with his sense of duty, brought forward facts—or what he believes to be facts—and laid them before the House. I confess that when the hon. Gentleman had done that, I thought he had done all that his ordinary sense of duty required him to do, and that we might put him and his proceedings out of account, and set to work to find out what foundation there was for the charges which he had made. The difficulties, the somewhat imaginary difficulties, of the hon. Gentleman under the heartless treatment which he has received in the formation of this Commission are illusory evils, and I think a little consideration will convince him that they have no real existence in fact. I leave the hon. Gentleman's personal complaints to come to the more objective criticism of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. In his speech the right hon. Gentleman seemed to take it as an axiom that, on the face of it, this was not the kind of Commission which would command the confidence of the country. On the face of things, it seems to me exactly the kind of Commission that would command the confidence of the country. No doubt it might be possible to find two additional persons who are thoroughly competent to join in this important inquiry. But my own view of a committee of investigation is that the smaller it is the quicker is its work and the more effective. That is the only reason why the Government preferred a Commission of three to a Commission of five. There may be something to be said for a Commission of five; but on the face of it, and on the obvious merits, there is an immense deal more to be said for a Commission of three. If you have a Commission of three, it is impossible to conceive a Commission which is more fitted than this one to carry out the work entrusted to it or which, on the face of it, is more impartial. What is one of the charges made against this Committee? The charge is that there are two medical men upon it. These medical men have no connection with the Army Medical Department. [An HON. MEMBER: Professional bias.] As the House very well knows, there has been a considerable conflict between the profession and the Army Medical Department, and I should have thought that if there was a danger it was the danger of injustice to the Army Medical Department, who are carrying on their duties under conditions not very familiar to doctors and surgeons at home accustomed to the perfect equipment of a London, Edinburgh, or Dublin hospital, and likely to be shocked beyond reason at the inevitable shortcomings which it is admitted on all hands must occcur when you are dealing with the exigencies of a rapid campaign. Therefore, I do not think that there is anything in the fact that these gentlemen are doctors which, considering their position, will make them in any sense lenient to the failures, if there have been failures, of the Army Medical Staff. I have not the honour of Dr. Church's or of Professor Cunningham's acquaintance. But I am informed that Dr. Church is not merely the official head at the present moment of the medical profession in this country, but that he is the President of the Royal College of Physicians, who, more than anyone in living memory, thoroughly enjoys the confidence of his colleagues, and is believed by them to be a man of peculiar fairness of mind, with a great power of organisation and business capacity. I am informed that the same qualities of common sense as well as high scientific qualities might be predicated of Professor Cunningham. There are some Gentlemen in this House, no doubt, who know him; and I have taken some trouble to make myself acquainted with his career and attainments.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): He is a Professor at Trinity College. He is not in practice.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Exactly. The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly accurate. That of itself goes to show that Professor Cunningham is a man who is independent of those waves and currents of medical opinion which are regarded as objections to doctors. Though not a practising doctor, and not actively connected with the medical profession, Professor Cunningham has, however, taken the most brilliant degrees in medicine and surgery, and is thoroughly well equipped from a professional point of view. There remains Lord Justice Romer; and can prejudice go further—I was going to say, can party feeling go further—than this calm assumption on the part of the hon.

Gentleman opposite that because a man is an eminent professor, or an eminent physician, or a distinguished judge, he therefore cannot have those qualities of practical common sense which are supposed to be found in other more fortunate sections and branches of the human race? When Lord Roberts spoke of common sense, he did not mean to imply that doctors had not common sense; still less did he mean to say it of so brilliant and distinguished a judge of the High Court, a man of the business qualities and the impartiality and the power of collecting and sifting evidence like Lord Justice Romer, which are the qualities you want in a man who is to preside over a Commission of this kind. This Commission, as I have indicated it to the House, has the great qualities of knowledge and impartiality stamped upon it. It has among its members two of the most highly-qualified and independent members of the medical profession. It has at its head a judge of the High Court in this country; and if confidence and impartiality are not to be secured by a Commission of that kind, then I despair of any Government or any House of Commons or any responsible Minister being able ever, now or in the future, to constitute a Commission which shall command the confidence of the country. I am sorry that this deliberate attempt has been made, before its labours have begun, to asperse the impartiality of the Commission; I deeply, profoundly regret it; but I firmly believe that when the names I have mentioned go forth to the country the people will not agree with the critics of the Government on this occasion, but that they will universally feel that the Government have striven, by names unexceptionable in themselves and by the smallness of the number, of which complaint has been made, to give the best security that their labours shall not only be rapid and effective, but rapid and conclusive.

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): I think that the House, or at least the large majority of it, without any distinction of party, must have listened with astonishment and disappointment to the right hon. Gentleman, to the somewhat cheap sarcasms which the right hon. Gentleman thought it to be in good taste to launch against his own supporter, the hon. Member for Westminster, and the thin debating points he sought to make against the hon. Member for Northampton. All these must have struck the House as being singularly out of consonance with the feeling which animates the majority of the House. When the right hon. Gentleman, in answer to the appeal made by my right hon. friend—and a more temperate and more reasonable appeal was never made by a Leader of the Opposition—accuses us of making this a party question on this side of the House——

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I never said so.

MR. ASQUITH: Yes; and of deliberately aspersing this Commission—I say that he is attributing to us motives which are entirely unworthy of any body of English gentlemen, and totally out of keeping with the feeling which pervades all classes of the community in relation to this most painful subject.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): No.

MR. ASQUITH: The hon. Member for Central Sheffield says "No," but I believe the right hon. Gentleman fails to apprehend altogether the source and the character of that disappointment. We do not dispute in the least the eminent qualifications of these gentlemen. One of them is, we know, President of the Royal College of Physicians, and if you are to have a medical man on the Commission, as you must have, I do not suppose it would be possible to have a better representative. Another gentleman is Professor of Anatomy in the University of Dublin. I have no doubt that he is a gentleman of the highest academical attainments, but whether a gentleman whose experience is confined to a chair of anatomy is most calculated to add strength to a Commission of this kind is a matter on which I must be allowed to express a doubt. And as to Lord Justice Romer, the third member of the Commission, no one who has had the great advantage, as I have had, of practising before him can dispute that he possesses all the highest judicial qualities. But when all is said, when all these admissions are made—and I make them fully and freely—the right hon. Gentleman has not met in the least degree, I will not say the protest, but the appeal, of my right hon. friend. What is the ground of it? It is this. Here is a matter which avowedly affects the feelings and the sentiments of a vast number of people in this country, and the health and lives of our soldiers in South Africa, as well as our operations in subsequent campaigns. Grave charges, charges of the most serious character, vouched for not only by the hon. Member for Westminster, but by almost a cloud of witnesses, have been made in respect of the provision against sickness made in the course of this campaign. The Government confess that they want to have these charges investigated to the bottom, and by a body which will command universal confidence throughout the Empire. These being the conditions under which you are acting and the objects which you are professing—I believe honestly professing—to seek to attain, in order to arrive at the best means of improving these conditions and of attaining these objects you appoint a Commission the majority of whose members will be medical men. I say to treat this primarily or fundamentally as merely a medical question is entirely to ignore some of the most important considerations. It will very likely turn out—I make the hypothesis merely because I have no knowledge—that as far as doctors, nurses, and orderlies are concerned everything was done that human skill and devotion could do, given the conditions under which they had to act. It will then become a question, and this will be the fundamental question which will govern the enquiries of the Commission, whether the conditions under which they were acting were avoidable conditions, or brought about by want of foresight or neglect on the part of those responsible, and, if so, who is responsible for that state of things and how can its recurrence be obviated. It is trifling with the intelligence of the country to say that an investigation of that kind, a Commission composed mainly of professional medical men, is the best Commission that could be constituted. If the right hon. Gentleman will allow us to treat this question in a dispassionate and impartial spirit, I want, if I can—the right hon. Gentleman makes it very difficult—like my right hon friend, to come to a modus vivendi acceptable to us all. May I once more, notwithstanding all that the right hon. Gentleman has said, put it to him whether, in the interests of securing unanimity in this House and general confidence in the country, he should not accept the suggestion, the most temperate and moderate suggestion of my right hon. friend—not necessarily, of course, now—to add to this Commission two men of experience in business, men of reputed common sense, men whose names would command general confidence? If he will give a response to that appeal, I believe he may confidently count on ascertaining the truth, on fixing the responsibility on the right shoulders, and, more important than all, on preventing a possible recurrence of this horrible state of things.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I venture to occupy the time of the House for a moment or two upon this important occasion, because I should not like the Government and my right hon. friend to believe that all those who sit upon this side of the House are satisfied with the constitution of this Commission. My right hon. friend said the smaller the Commission the better, but upon those grounds he might have appointed one doctor to examine into the whole question. Allow me to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the object which I know he has in view, and which we all have in view, is to ascertain the whole truth about this question. With regard to the statements of the hon. Member for Westminster, though I make no statement for or against his veracity, I have no doubt, and I believe also the Government have no doubt, that what he says he saw he did see, and the Government appreciate the necessity of finding out the whole truth of this allegation, and whether it affects the medical officers or the transport. But they have appointed two medical men and a judge. I venture to say that if this was a question of investigating the mode in which the sick were treated in South Africa two doctors would be eminently satisfactory, but that is not the question. We want to know whether these horrible sufferings described so vividly by my hon. friend could or could not be obviated. What are the facts? We want to find out first of all whether the allegations of my hon. friend are true, and whether the medical appliances and equipment were satisfactory at Bloemfontein and elsewhere, and we want to find out whether the transport is to blame for not bringing up to Bloemfontein those appliances which it is said might have been brought up. Who is to examine into this? Not the doctors. They, I fancy, will probably examine into the way in which the patients were treated, and I have no doubt that these two medical gentlemen—against whose reputation nobody can say a word—will say that all that medical science and skill could do under such circumstances has been done. We believe that nobody says a word against the treatment so far as the treatment could be carried out. I do not know if other Members have had experience of these matters, but I have. I have seen a doctor called in in an intricate case, and what was the inevitable result? That that eminent person comes out from the consultation and says everything possible that could be done has been done, but that he had advised a modification of the treatment. These gentlemen will, I have no doubt, do their best, but the esprit de corps which exists pre-eminently amongst doctors will of necessity bias their minds. But who is to judge upon the other questions—as to whether the transport arrangements were satisfactory, and, if the allegations which the hon. Member for Westminster made in drawing attention to the problem are true, the blame undoubtedly does attach to the transport for not bringing up in time those medical comforts, etc., which were wanted at Bloemfontein and elsewhere. Is Lord Justice Romer to go into the question of transport? I do not wish to say anything with regard to his Lordship, but I should think the only thing he knew about transport was transporting prisoners. I say if this Commission is to be constituted, it must not be a Commission in which the majority are doctors. I say, without the slightest hesitation, that this Commission, if it examines the whole of these matters, will not and ought not to have that weight with public opinion which we all hope a Commission appointed by the Government should have. We want the mind of the country set at rest, and in order to do that a Commission ought to be appointed whose decision will carry weight with it. I venture to suggest to the Government that the proposition made by the hon. Members on the opposite benches, that two lay members should be added to this Commission, would enormously add to its weight, and at the same time would effect the right hon. Gentleman's desire, and not only throw more light on to the question, but would carry that light into the heart of the country.

Colonel Saunderson.

*Captain NORTON (Newington, W.): Perhaps I might be permitted to take part in this debate, because I feel very strongly upon this question. I pointed out some time ago that we should want two or three Army corps for this war in South Africa, and I also pointed out that the Army Medical Department was not sufficiently strong in point of numbers. Now that the Army medical arrangements have broken down we are to have an inquiry as to how that took place. It can only have taken place for one of two reasons: either the Medical Department was in itself defective, and they had not the personnel and the stores they required; or the blame must be cast upon the Transport Department, because, assuming that the personnel and the stores were sufficient, they did not bring them up at the proper period; yet we are to have a Commission appointed of which two members are members of the profession of the Army Medical Department, which it is suggested is to blame—that is not the class of Commission to deal with that question—and added to them we have a judge to do—what? To inquire into the question of transport! I firmly expected to see one of the most eminent of our traffic managers of the great railways of this country upon this Commission. What the country is looking at is this. They have made great sacrifices, and have made them willingly, but they have been under the impression—and it has been said that this is no party question, but I say it is most distinctly a party question—that everything that could be done had been done for the sick and wounded. If the Government declares war it is their duty to be prepared for it and the conduct of it. After the Egyptian campaign the medical arrangements were found to be very defective, and the medical men connected with the Army Medical Department were absolutely deficient in numbers to deal with the situation as it developed in South Africa. What the country wants to know is on whom does the blame rest—upon the authorities at home, who did not take steps in time, knowing as they must have known that in South Africa there must be an enormous amount of enteric fever at the close of the campaign; or upon the medical men, who were unable to carry out their duty owing to defective transport? The country want to see the responsibility put upon the shoulders of the proper persons, and they want to know why they were led to believe when they made these great sacrifices that their sons and their relatives were, so far as the medical arrangements were concerned, receiving every attention. They want to know why there was any suppression of what has taken place, and why from the press reports they were led to believe that everything was all right and in order. I will simply conclude my observations by suggesting that two lay members who have a knowledge of transport should be added to the Commission.

SIR MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbrightshire) said he did not propose to occupy the time of the House more than a few moments. He merely desired to express a wish that the right hon. Gentleman would add two more members to the Commission. Speaking for the prevailing feeling in the south-west of Scotland, from which he had just returned, upon this question, he could say that nine people out of ten did not believe in two doctors who would invariably agree with regard to the Commission. These medical gentlemen were the best men that could be got, and he did not impute that they were in any way unfit persons. Lord Justice Romer also was an extremely able man, but if the right hon. Gentleman would appoint two additional lay members he would have the country at his back. If he went to the country with the Commission as at present constituted, although no doubt the Commission would report unanimously, the country would have no confidence in it.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I feel very strongly indeed upon this question, one aspect of which is liable to be overlooked if the Committee is constituted as suggested. I desire to support the application which has been made to the right hon. Gentleman, because we all know that there is a chance when these operations are over of a general inquiry into the whole question of the war, and if we withdraw from that inquiry as we shall by this Commission, the whole of the Medical Department, we are absolutely bound to make this part of the inquiry thorough; because it will not be held at any other time. Now, I am not able to convince myself that the Committee as constituted will be likely to thoroughly investigate the condition of the Army Medical Department, and to ascertain what has been well done and what has been ill done in the campaign. The Army Medical Department is alleged to have failed to some extent, but it is a miracle to some of us that it has succeeded to the extent it has. The hon. Member for Northampton was correct when he said that the constitution of the Army Medical Department has been condemned over and over again. I was present when the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War told us that the Department had been increased tenfold since the war began.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The hon. Member is now discussing a matter outside the range of the motion.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER: All I wish to point out is that the efficiency of the Army Medical Department, having regard to the constitution of the Commission, is not likely to be thoroughly and satisfactorily investigated. I should like to be able to carry the inquiry a great deal further than a purely medical inquiry, so that it should ascertain not only the facts as to whether there were a certain number of medical attendants, nurses, and so forth in South Africa, but whether the provision was such as to enable them to work with efficiency, and whether their inefficiency has been referable to the conditions under which they had to work. I am quite confident that the attention of someone should be directed to this. The right hon. Gentleman asked who has been charged with the responsibility for this matter. I do not believe that the responsibility will be found to rest on the medical men or the attendants. I believe that the responsibility will be found to rest for whatever has been done amiss with those who organised the Army Medical Department on the present basis, and I want someone not deterred by professional antecedents from bringing home directly that responsibility.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In reply to what has fallen from my hon. friend who has just sat down, I would venture to deprecate any extension of the already large subject of inquiry which is to be committed to this body of gentlemen. When they have completed their labours and made their report to the Army Medical Department, either they or another Commission may be entrusted with the further inquiry my hon. friend desires. But let us in the first instance try to get to the bottom of this specific and limited, though all-important, subject. I would ask my hon. friend to take that as a sufficient reply, as indicating, at all events, my personal feeling on the point he has brought before the House. May I also say, what I did not like to say by way of interruption of the right hon. Gentleman, that I certainly never intended to reflect on gentlemen who sit on the Front Opposition Bench? I am not aware of anything that has fallen either from the Leader of the Opposition or those in his immediate confidence which indicates that he or they had any desire from the beginning of these transactions to turn this into a party question; and if I used any phrase of that kind that justly bore that meaning it must have been by inadvertence. I certainly neither felt it nor thought it. It is perfectly evident to me, after listening to what has passed, that the general sense of the House is in favour of an increase in the size of the Commission. I frankly say that, in my opinion, the House is wrong. I think the proposal of the Government was unquestionably a businesslike proposal and one likely to lead to the most rapid and satisfactory results. But I notice that not only those who may be said to be professionally opposed to the Government take a different view, but also the right hon. Gentleman opposite and friends on this side of the House who, I believe, are anxious that this Commission should enjoy general confidence. It is because I fear that the kind of criticism passed on both sides of the House on the Commission in its narrower aspect may in the mind of some outside the House shake their belief in it, that I think the view held by the House is one which ought to be considered by the Government, and considered very favourably. I do not think, after what has occurred, it would be possible to restrict the number to three. I ought frankly to say to the House that under the circumstances I cannot ensure that the three eminent Gentleman I have named can be regarded as having given a final assent to serving on the Commission. I know that the chairman was greatly induced to consent to go through all the toil and responsibility which presiding over such a Commission would entail upon him by the fact that he thought the smallness of the number would greatly facilitate the operations of the body. I certainly shall have to appeal to him again regarding his services and ask whether he is disposed to give them. Though I think the two eminent doctors—or, rather, the eminent doctor and the eminent man of science—who have already accepted places on the Commission know too much of the House of Commons to take quite seriously the criticisms which have been passed, still I confess that after they have read the statements in debate that the fact of their being doctors prejudices them in favour of the Army Medical Service, and that their opinion is not to be trusted on that ground, they may, perhaps, think that they are not called upon to go through all the labours that the work of this Commission will entail. I earnestly hope that will not be the case. I think myself they would be very ill-advised if they took too seriously this particular class of criticism, and I shall regard it—I say it with a full sense of responsibility — as a great public calamity if, in consequence of these somewhat reckless attacks, they should think it necessary to decline to serve. In the meanwhile, I shall do my best, though against my own judgment, to consult with my colleagues as to how we can best increase the number from three to five. I imagine that the House will entirely, at all events, agree with me in this: that the one thing to be avoided is the appointment of a politician by profession.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I think the right hon. Gentleman has rightly interpreted the feeling of the House of Commons by agreeing to the extension of the Commission. I think it is very important indeed that in connection with this very important matter, in which the people of the country take so keen an interest, the members of the Commission should be increased by a certain business element, which I am sure will be welcomed by none more than by the eminent medical men who are to be on this Commission.

MR. LABOUCHERE: After this concession—in somewhat ungracious terms—by the right hon. Gentleman, I would ask leave to withdraw my motion.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to the Ancient Monuments Protection Bill, with Amendments.

ANCIENT MONUMENTS PROTECTION BILL.

Lords Amendments to be considered upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 284.]

TITHE RENT-CHARGE (IRELAND) BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

[Mr. J. W. LOWTHER (Cumberland, Penrith) in the Chair.]

Clause 2:—

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): In proposing to leave out Sub-section 2 of this clause, I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland what will be the financial effect of the section if carried out as it now stands. My reason for asking is that Sub-section 2 proposes to repeat the operation provided for by Sub-section 1. If the financial effect would be serious, that would be a reason for striking out Sub-section 2. I wish to know, also, what will be the financial effect on the Church Fund of Sub-section 1 of this clause. I think the Committee ought to be content with the first variation.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central) said the hon. Gentleman would remember that the average reduction during the first term was 20·9 per cent.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The right hon. Gentleman has exactly appreciated the nature of the question I have put to him. I now understand that the effect of Sub-section 1, if applied as it stands, will be to reduce the amount of tithe by 20·9 per cent. That is a serious reduction, and we should be content with that variation for one period of fifteen years. I think that is a sufficient reason for the Amendment I now move. I do not suppose that one Member in ten in the House has read the sub-section, and if they did read it they could not exactly say what is the meaning of it. Roughly speaking, if you find this variation for one period of fifteen years reducing the tithe by 20·9 per cent. you have to repeat that operation for the second term of fifteen years. That I understand to be the meaning of the sub-section. I think when you have reduced the tithe once by 20·9 per cent. you have done sufficiently well.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 6, to leave out Sub-section 2."—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section 2 stand part of the clause."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The effect of the Amendment will be to replace the standard of variation by a charge which will last for ever. What the Government propose is not extravagant, from the point of view of the reductions that will be immediately effected and of the reductions that may be effected later on.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I support the proposal of my hon. friend. It appears to me that this sub-section rather aggravates the injustice produced by the first sub-section. The peculiarity of this is that it proceeds in wrong-doing in geometrical progression. It begins by doing a bad thing in the first sub-section, and it is worse again in the second sub-section. I am not sure that I have entirely grasped the meaning of these two sub-sections, but my understanding is this: We have, as everybody knows, under the Land Act of 1881, a period of fifteen years during which the reduction of rent lasts. At the end of each period of fifteen years there may be, on the application of the tenants, a further hearing and a further reduction. As a matter of fact, there have been in many cases a further hearing and a considerable further increase in the reduction. As I understand this Bill, the tithe is to be reduced not merely in respect of the reduction of rent for the first statutory term of fifteen years, but also on the second statutory term of fifteen years. Therefore, these tithes are to be subjected to periodic and successive reductions. We are not dealing here with a single and permanent reduction of tithe, but with a plan that proposes reductions of tithes with successive reductions of rent. Let me point out to the Committee the full effect of this most extraordinary proposal. The right hon. Gentleman pointed out, in reply to my hon. friend, and he quoted the figures correctly, that the average reduction of rent in the first statutory term was 20·9 per cent. It is plain to everybody, granting that there should be a reduction at all, which I do not, that this reduction of 20·9 would be adequate enough to meet even the demands which the right hon. Gentleman puts forward on behalf of the landlords. But the right hon. Gentleman does not stand at that point. In order to fully appreciate the sub-section you must go on to consider what has been done in Ireland under the second section. What is happening? We have in the first statutory term a reduction of 20·9, but, further than that, this reduction of 20·9 is not a universal reduction applicable to all parts of Ireland, or rather this 20.9 is the average of Ireland as a whole. It is not the average of Ireland according to the provinces. That is my point, and the Committee should take this into consideration. I find that in the county Antrim the average reduction is 28·7, in Armagh 29·5, and in Fermanagh it rises to 30·7. So you have this extraordinary state of things: under these two sub-sections, the greater the reductions of rent, or, in other words, the more oppressive the landlords have been, the greater the reduction of tithe. In other words, the good landlords are penalised and the bad landlords are rewarded under this Bill. If it can be proved that the landlords have charged fair rents, if it can be proved that the landlords have been good landlords, then their tithes remain high, or comparatively so; but if it can be proved that the landlords have charged high rents, and that there have been big reductions, then the bad landlords get the benefit of this by having their tithes reduced, with the extraordinary consequence which I am about to show, and I invite the attention of the House to this. I wish to point out to hon. Gentlemen representing Ulster constituencies, that rents have been more exorbitant there than in the other parts of Ireland. In what they would call a disloyal county like Cork the average reduction of rent in the first statutory period was 22·3, in a terrible county like Galway 18. and in a county like Roscommon, where a Unionist would not have the smallest chance of the position of bailiff, 16.8. In so-called disloyal Roscommon the tithe is to be reduced 16·8, and in loyal, Unionist, industrious, and God-fearing Antrim, Armagh, and Fermanagh it will be reduced on an average 28·7, 29·5, and 30·7, so that under this Bill, supported by the hon. Members opposite, some of them representing tenant farmers as well as landlords, and sent into this House to advocate the claims of tenant farmers, these loyal counties will be fined doubly. They are supporting a Bill which, as I have shown, penalises these counties, because, after all, the counties are interested in this matter. A reduction of tithe to a landlord is an injury to the counties, because it means a reduction of the Irish Church Fund, which is to be used for one part of Ireland as well as another. They are supporting a Bill which has for its effect to reduce the tithes of the landlords to a larger extent in the counties they represent than in other counties. In fact, this Bill may be properly and accurately described as a bonus on rack-renting by a reduction of tithe. Furthermore, my hon. friend has pointed out this is a treble reduction of tithe—the reduction, in the case of those who have commuted the tithe, by the obliteration of seven instalments; the reduction, in the case of the first statutory term, of 20·9 per cent. on the average all over the country; and the reduction on the second statutory term where there have been larger reductions made in some cases than on the first term. Let me give the Committee a few figures on the second statutory reductions to show the effect of this Bill under this particular sub-section. I go again to the county represented by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite—the Member for North Antrim. The average reduction in the second statutory term in the county Antrim—in the year ending March 31st, 1899—was 31·2, in Armagh 30·1, and in Down, the very ark of the covenant of loyalty in Ireland, the heroic and loyal landlords had their rents reduced 31·3 per cent. I do not see the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh, but if he were here I would congratulate him on the splendid political strategy by which he has been able to convince his consituents in the north of Ireland that they are gaining enormous benefits by a Union which makes their rents 31·3 per cent. higher than the Commissioners in the courts of the land think they should fairly pay. I think it is one of the most marvellous appeals made to prejudice when they lose sight of their own personal interest. Therefore, under this Bill, and this sub-section in particular, Armagh will be penalised more than any other county. In Antrim, Armagh, and Down rents have been more exorbitant, and the landlords more exacting and less honest than in any of the counties in the other provinces of Ireland. What is the average reduction in Ulster as a whole? It is 28 per cent. on the second statutory term, and the 26 or 28 per cent. on the first statutory term is in addition. The result is that in the province of Ulster, where rents in the two statutory terms have been reduced 50 per cent. or a little more, the landlords by this precious Bill, and by the assistance of hon. Gentlemen opposite representing those constituencies, are going to get 50 per cent. reductions of their tithes.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said it could not yet be ascertained what the average reduction of rents for the second statutory term would be.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: As I told the right hon. Gentleman yesterday, his extraordinary ingenuity, subtlety, and resource in advancing arguments have commanded my admiration, but the argument he has just advanced is too grotesque even to put before hon. Gentlemen who are helping their friends to get booty out of public taxation. The right hon. Gentleman says that nobody can tell what the rents for the second statutory terms will be. But we can forecast the result; we have the facts and figures before us of what is taking place now; we have the general condition of Ireland; we have the reductions set forth on almost every farm in Ireland. In the face of this enormous pile of evidence, enabling us to forecast with almost mathematical accuracy what will take place, the right hon. Gentleman tells us we have no facts to go upon.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is impossible to say until the end of the fifteen years what the average reduction will be. Any individual case may be altogether wrong.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: There may be a variation of perhaps 1 per cent. But putting the first and second statutory terms together, the average reduction in Antrim is 50·9 per cent.; in Armagh, 59·6 per cent.; in county Down, 59·5 per cent.; so that in those three loyalist counties you have an average reduction of nearly 60 per cent. In other words, the loyalist Unionist landlords have been charging 60 per cent. above fair and proper rents. The average in all Ulster of the two reductions is 54 per cent. But in Connaught, for instance, the reduction comes to only about 40 per cent. We can now see why the right hon. Gentleman puts in the second statutory term. He knows that in Ulster there have been big reductions under the second statutory term, and not satisfied with giving the landlords the benefit of the reduction on the first term of 28 per cent., he piles on another 28 per cent., and gives the convicted plunderers another bonus for rack-renting their tenants. The more you test this ridiculous and absurd Bill the more its extravagance and injustice are apparent. The landlords of Roscommon, who have treated their tenants well, have had their rents reduced only 14 per cent., and what is their reward? The reward of the landlord of Roscommon is, because he is a good landlord, that he gets his tithe reduced by 14 per cent., but the landlord of the North, because he has been an unjust, rack-renting, and oppressive landlord, gets his tithe reduced by 60 per cent. The whole effect of this Bill is to reward the wicked and to punish the good; and by what possible means the right hon. Gentleman can reconcile such a measure to his political conscience I for one am perfectly unable to understand.

MR. ARCHDALE (Fermanagh, N.): The hon. Member for the Scotland Division has helped the Chief Secretary in his argument against the Amendment, because the counties he has named as having received large reductions are agricultural counties, and naturally they are more reduced than the grass counties of Roscommon and others. Down, Armagh, and Antrim are the three most agricultural counties in Ulster, and have therefore suffered most by the fall in prices, and that is the reason this clause has been brought into the Bill and why the people who own the land there should get more reduction than in other counties, where the price of produce has not been so much reduced. It is not owing to their being worse landlords, as it is a matter of common notoriety that the landlords of Down and Antrim are rather good landlords.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.) said that whether the system of farming was grass, tillage, or mixed, it had been proved to demonstration that the rents were so high that they had been reduced enormously. The point with regard to this sub-section was that apparently there was to be no finality in this system of the reduction of the tithe. Under the first sub-section the average worked out at about 20·9, and it must be assumed that in the second statutory term there would be a further reduction. No doubt the amount of the reduction could not be estimated exactly, but from the decisions already arrived at a fairly accurate approximate conclusion could be formed, and it was evident there would be considerable reductions all over Ireland. Assuming that for the second statutory term there was a further reduction of 20 per cent., that would make at the end of the thirty years 40 per cent. If, owing to economic conditions and the continued fall in judicial rents in consequence of the fall in prices of agricultural produce, the landlord was to continue to get his tithe reduced, it came to this—that tithe was no longer a tithe on land, but a tithe on rent. That was an economic fallacy that everyone could perceive. If economic rent disappeared in Ireland the revenue of the Irish Church Fund would disappear with it, because the landlord would pay no tithe even though he had a large amount of the land in his own possession. The more the sub-section was examined the more its unfairness appeared. If the landlord was to get this booty, let it be fixed at the 20 per cent. or 25 per cent. on the first statutory term, although even then the opponents of the Bill would not acknowledge its justice; but let it not be said there was to be no finality. If, owing to the continued fall in prices, with perhaps a simultaneous rise in the price of labour, there are further reductions in rent, and consequently in tithe under the operation of this Bill, the corpus of the Church Fund will also gradually disappear. The Nationalists would not have offered such determined and strenuous opposition to this Bill if the money had been coming from Imperial funds instead of from the Irish Church Fund——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! That does not seem to me to be relevant to the Amendment before the Committee.

Mr. FLYNN contended that the first sub-section set up an injustice in that it measured the reduction of tithe by the average reduction of rent in the various counties for the first statutory term, but that bad condition of things would be made still worse by the second sub-section. A good case had been made out for striking out the sub-section, and he hoped the Government would not be obstinate over the matter.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.) said the hon. Gentleman opposite had professed to give a reason why the reductions of rent in the north of Ireland were so much greater than in the south, and that reason was one of the most singular he had ever heard. The fact that the northern counties were agricultural, and for that reason had received larger reductions of rent, did not in the slightest degree affect the injustice of those rents. Those reductions of rent were an indictment against the northern landlords, and the point taken by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division with regard to Sub-sections 1 and 2 was absolutely unanswerable. The Bill actually proposed to give throughout Ireland the greatest reduction of tithe in those counties where the landlords had been the greatest rack-renters. An attempt was being made to force through the House by the closure, by sneers, but really without any argument at all, a Bill which for complexity and entanglement was one of the most formidable he had ever known, the object being to get the Committee to commit itself to a raid on a public fund, but the object was wrapped up in such a mass of technicalities and disguises that he doubted whether one of the 400 Members who had voted in the divisions had the faintest idea of the A B C of the whole question. The hon. Member for the Scotland Division had just pointed out that under the extraordinary and unheard of system or standard of variation set up by these sub-sections the Province of Ulster would obtain an enormous advantage, amounting to nearly 100 per cent. in some cases, as compared with the southern provinces. That immediately recalled to his mind the fact that Ulster was always tithed a great deal lower than the other provinces of Ireland, and now this ingenious system had been devised by which an enormously larger reduction of tithe would be given to the province which had always been tithed lower than any other province in Ireland. That that was the fact with regard to Ulster was shown by the Report of the Tithes Commission. The right hon. Gentleman had repeated that if the system of variation of tithes at present in force in England was extended to Ireland it would inevitably result in a larger reduction than would be the case under this Bill. That really was not true. That argument might have had some weight in regard to Sub-section 1, which dealt only with the reduction for the first statutory term, but under Sub-section 2 a much longer step was taken, and that contention entirely disappeared. The grand discovery had been made that the tithe must vary with the rent; but what would be said if that theory were applied to England?

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Committee have already decided that point, and we cannot go back on that decision.

MR. DILLON submitted, with all respect, that the Committee had done nothing of the kind. The Committee had not yet decided that the tithe was to be varied at all. In fact, the Chairman himself had ruled that the question of varying would have to be discussed on Clause 3.

*THE CHAIRMAN: What I intended to say was that the Committee decided yesterday that the standard of variation should be rent and not prices.

MR. DILLON said the Committee were now discussing a sub-section which proposed to set up as a standard of variation an extension of that system, and if they were entitled to discuss the clause at all they were entitled to discuss it from the point of view of extending the variation in direct relation to the fluctuation of rents. All that was decided by the first sub-section was that there should be a reduction of 20·9 per cent. according to that standard, but the Committee had not in any way, impliedly or directly, decided yet whether tithes should vary or even the standard. Sub-section 2 provided that they were not to stop at a reduction the amount of which was known, but they were to take a further step and plunge into the unknown. The right hon. Gentleman asked what would happen if the English system were applied to Ireland. He would reply in the Irish fashion by asking another question: What would happen in England if the Irish system were extended to England? What would be the feeling in the Church of England if a Bill were introduced providing that on large estates in this country where no rent was paid or recoverable, no tithe should be paid? There would be a very considerable row, and that row would be increased if it was further provided that tithe rent-charge should be treated, practically speaking, pari passu with rent, and that no tithe rent-churge should be payable unless the rent was paid out of the land. Under this sub-section was introduced the principle of a possible illimitable variation of tithe in direct proportion to the variation of rent, and such a principle was, in the first place, against the whole tradition of tithe rent-charge and tithe settlement in Ireland, and in the second place grotesquely unjust in its working. The landlords claimed that they would be better off if they had a variation according to prices——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The Committee have decided that question; we cannot go back on that.

MR. DILLON explained that he was endeavouring to reply to an argument the right hon. Gentleman had used in the course of the debate. He would, however, reserve his remarks upon that point, and content himself now with expressing his strong opposition to this sub-section.

MR. POWER (Waterford, E.) believed the Committee were discussing one of the most complicated measures ever introduced into Parliament, and Members had much reason to complain that more accurate data and figures were not presented to them in order that they might be able more fully to grasp the effects of the measure. At present the Bill had to be discussed upon mere conjecture, and that was not at all a satisfactory state of things. With regard to the particular Amendment under discussion, he objected altogether to the proposed standard of variation. Tithe was not a charge on rent; it was one of the first charges on land, and it ought to be regarded as such. The right hon. Gentleman, replying to certain remarks from the Irish benches, had said that the arguments came to nothing, because this was not a question between landlord and tenant. Strictly speaking, that might be so, but at the same time it was a question with regard to a fund, essentially an Irish fund, created for Irish purposes—a fund which has already been raided more than once by the landlords, but which ought to be administered for the benefit of Ireland as a whole. The tenants were, therefore, directly concerned. Time after time it had been stated that this fund could not bear any further charge——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is not now addressing himself to the Amendment before the Committee.

MR. POWER said he was really not competent to speak upon this complicated measure, and he would simply say that the Committee had reason to complain that more information had not been supplied.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid) thought it was very unfortunate that the carrying out of this measure should be left in the hands of the Land Commission. It really meant that the decision of the question would be left in the hands of an interested authority. The Land Commission would have the power to raise or reduce rents, and rents were to be the basis for the payment of tithe. There was a fearful danger that the rents of the tenantry of Ireland would be raised simply to enable the trustees of the Irish Church Fund to keep that fund intact. The Land Commission were the trustees of the fund, and it was their business to keep the fund intact; therefore when this question came up for decision would they not be naturally inclined to be the guardians of the fund rather than to reduce the rents, by which the revenue of the fund would be also reduced? This proposal struck a blow at judicial integrity, and was fraught with the greatest danger. The Bill simply carried out under another name the recommendations of the Fry Commission. The right hon. Gentleman might pursue a policy of silence; it was all very well to draft a Bill which was a riddle and a puzzle; but the Irish Members were determined to drag the proposals into the light of day and to let it be seen what they really meant. This was a landlords' Bill from beginning to end——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! The hon. Member is now discussing the whole effect of the Bill.

MR. MURNAGHAN said he was trying to discuss the sub-section. It was most unfortunate that the right hon. Gentleman should leave to a tribunal the decision of a case in which that tribunal was interested. The Land Commission ought not to be hampered with any such duties, and, if for no other reason than the one he had put forward, the Committee ought to reject this sub-section.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Mr. Patrick O'Brien and Mr. Flynn.

MR. CLANCY (Dublin County, N.) desired to move the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Louth. In Ireland they had had some experience in this matter in connection with the certificates in regard to rates issued by the Local Government Board. In many instances those certificates were absolutely incorrect, and would have inflicted great injustice in a number of cases if the power of varying them had not been conferred by the Local Government Act. If the Local Government Board was liable to make such errors the Land Commission was still more liable. The record of the Land Commission proved that it was a body—whether because it had too much to do, or had not enough men to do it, or from any other cause, he did not know—which could not be relied upon in every instance to issue absolutely accurate certificates. The Amendment simply enabled them if they discovered a mistake to rectify the error, and he could not see how the Government could object to the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 24, at the end, to add the words, '(7) The Land Commission may at any time amend or vary any certificate made under this section, and the certificate when so amended or varied shall have effect accordingly.'"—(Mr. Clancy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said that this Amendment was put down by the hon. Member for North Louth in connection with an Amendment to an earlier section. That Amendment had been rejected by the Committee, and therefore the present proposal was not required. Moreover, under the proposal of the Government it was perfectly competent for the Land Commission to correct any clerical errors that might be made.

MR. CLANCY did not think the Amendment as originally put down was intended to depend upon the adoption of a former Amendment. At any rate, it applied equally to the section as it now stood, and he should press it, if necessary, to a division. The Land Commission had committed blunders in the past, and he was not willing to trust them in the future. As regarded their power to alter certificates without statutory enactment, he would like to ask the Attorney General whether under the Local Government Act power was not expressly given to the Local Government Board to make variations.

MR. DILLON: We are told that the whole basis of this Bill is a mistake by Mr. Gladstone, which the House of Commons did not discover for nearly thirty years. Is it unnatural to imagine that even such a body as the Land Commission might make mistakes when they are drafting these extraordinary documents? I was once fairly good at arithmetic, although I have forgotten it now, but if I set about carrying out the instructions in this clause I should not know how to begin, although I daresay I would be able to hold my own in arithmetic with some of the Land Commissioners. It is not only a question of arithmetic, but also of the interpretation of words. Here is what the Land Commissioners are called upon to do. They—

"shall ascertain from the appendices to their Reports, as presented to Parliament in pursuance of Section 55 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1881, by what amount in each county during the period commencing with and including the year covered by the Annual Report dated the 20th day of September, 1886, and ending with that presented last before the passing of this Act, the rents of holdings in respect of which judicial rents have been fixed for a first statutory term, whether by order or by agreement, have, for the entire of such period, been varied by the fixing of such judicial rents, and shall certify the average percentage which such variation represents."

I have read this over about ten times, and if I had the Reports before me I should find great difficulty in knowing how to commence, and I doubt whether many hon. Members would be absolutely clear as to how they should set about it. What is an "average percentage"? Is the percentage of variation in each individual case to be taken, and the average then struck, or is the total of the old rents to be deducted from the total of the judicial rents? The matter is of such importance that the words should be perfectly clear. I should like to hear some skilful gentleman like the hon. Member from North Antrim explain how he would set about working it out. Would he take the percentage of each reduction and then strike an average, or deduct the total of the old rents from the total of the new, and find out the percentage of reduction in that way? I cannot see why this Amendment should be objected to. It is absolutely harmless, and would be very useful. Then it is stated—

"A copy of every certificate of the Land Commission under this section shall be published in the Dublin Gazette."

Supposing you do not put in this Amendment, the original printed document will be the evidence, and if any other document is put in the whole calculation will be upset. I do not believe that another document could be printed without this Amendment, and speaking under correction, I believe also that if the Commissioners make a mistake they will not be able to rectify it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): The Commissioners will take the judicial rents over an entire county, and compare them with the previous rents, and then arrive at the average reduction. If £100 rent is reduced to £80 all over the county, then of course the reduction will be 20 per cent. The hon. Member who moved this Amendment asked if there would be any difficulty in amending an order, provided it was found that a mistake had been made. When power is given to a Court to make an order, you not only give power to the Court to pronounce the right order upon the facts before it at the time, but also power to make a different order if it turns out that the facts were different. If, for instance, the Court finds that the total is wrong, or something of that kind, it will be quite competent for the Court to change a certificate based on that total so as to bring it into conformity with the facts. Suppose the reduction all over a county turned out to be 25 per cent., and supposing by a clerical error it was put down at 20 per cent., the Court would have power to amend their original order accordingly. That is all that is required and all that is desired. It is not intended that the Court should again enter on an investigation beyond verifying the mere figures. It is merely a matter of arithmetic, and power is given by this clause to amend orders in such cases.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE (Antrim, N.) said he quite agreed with the Attorney General that if the Land Commission were directed to make an order they would also have the power of revision.

MR. CLANCY said that in the Local Government Act the Local Government Board were expressly given power to correct certificates if they issued them.

MR. ATKINSON: That was in cases of very elaborate calculations, where hundreds of things had to be taken into account. They were cases altogether different from the cases connected with the present Bill.

MR. DILLON: Although the Attorney General has an exalted opinion of the Land Commissioners, still they are not infallible in these matters. I may be excessively stupid, but after all that has been said I still maintain and believe that there is great uncertainty in the wording of the clause. What the Attorney General has described as the average percentage of reduction is not the true average at all. The proper way to arrive at the average would be to take the percentage of reduction in each case and then strike the average between these percentages. That would work out very differently from the mode suggested by the Attorney General. Suppose, for instance, the Land Commission had to deal with one rent of £1,000 and three rents of £10 each; suppose the latter were reduced 50 per cent., and the £1,000 rent was only reduced by 5 per cent., you can easily see that the two methods—the method advocated by the Attorney General and the method I suggest—would produce utterly different results. There might be a difference of even 10 per cent. or 15 per cent. It is by no means a matter of totals, as the Attorney General has indicated, and where it was a question of 300 or 400 rents it would be a very complex matter indeed.

MR. CLANCY: The Amendment cannot possibly do any harm, and I should like to know why it is not accepted.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is not correct, as the hon. Member said, that we are adopting a wrong principle in arriving at the average percentage of reduction. The Amendment had been put down by the hon. Member for North Louth in connection with the Amendments which have been rejected by the Committee, and it is therefore not now required. In the actual circumstance of the case, having regard to the nature of the calculations to be made, it is absolutely unnecessary.

MR. FLYNN: I cannot understand what objection there can be to accepting this Amendment. The Attorney General says that the Land Commission will arrive at the average reduction by taking the sum total of the judicial rents and comparing them with the sum total of the old rents, and then striking an average percentage. But these percentages have never yet been used in an Act of Parliament. They have been merely used for statistical purposes, and that, of course, makes all the difference. If a mistake is made there is practically no power of appeal, because what is everybody's business is nobody's business. A mistake may occur, and may not be discovered for two or three years, and then the responsibility is thrown on an individual of going into the Courts to show that a mistake has been committed. Moreover, it would then be too late, because the production of a copy of the Dublin Gazette containing the certificate would be regarded as proof of its accuracy, and it would be too late for revision. The Amendment says that the Land Commission may at any time amend or vary any certificate made under this section, and that the certificate when so amended or varied shall have effect accordingly. If this Amendment is not accepted, once the copy of the certificate appears in the Dublin Gazette I contend that it is binding for the full period of fifteen years, and even the Land Commissioners themselves will have no power to revise it. I cannot see why the Government should not accept the Amendment.

MR. DOOGAN (Tyrone, E.) said that the words of the clause were very misleading, and therefore he hoped that the Government would accept the Amendment.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Dr. TANNER, Cork Co., Mid). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

MR. MURNAGHAN: In moving the rejection of this clause I do so on the ground that no sufficient reason has been given, and no arguments of a character sufficiently convincing to business men have been brought before the Committee, to upset the settlement arrived at in 1872. The clause asks the Committee to break away from the arrangement of 1872, when there was fixed a tithe rent-charge, the variable method of which the tithe payers of the country freely and willingly entered into. There was no protest on their part, they freely assented to it, and there is no justification for their coming to this House now and asking us to change that arrangement, for no better reason than that the change may bring gain to themselves. In 1872 the tithe-paying class—the landlord class—entered into an arrangement with the State for the compounding of the tithes, and at that time a very good offer was made by the Government, which was freely accepted. Now because of the fall in the prices of produce these people came to this House and asks it to undo an arrangement which has lasted for twenty years. If the Government had accepted the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Dublin it might have gone a little way to modify the vicious character of this clause. The hon. Member proposed that instead of basing the rentals on the years since 1886 the arrangement should be to go back fifteen years previously; and it seems to be a reasonable proposal, because that would take the time back to the date when this contract was entered into with the State, but the Government did not see its way to accept that suggestion. I take a different view of this matter to some of those around me. I look on this as a very dangerous proposal, and I think it will act disastrously so far as the tenant farmers of Ireland are concerned. I think if the Government had accepted the proposal to fix the tithe rent-charge on the judicial rent it would have been much more satisfactory, because it would have removed from the landlord the temptation to raise the rent, which would have been very important. The right hon. Member for North Londonderry smiles, but I think when the Land Commission comes to look into the matter he will be somewhat surprised.

MR. ATKINSON: Does the hon. Gentleman know that the Land Commission has no interest whatever in the tithe rent-charge?

MR. MURNAGHAN: They are the trustees of the Irish Church Fund, and it is to their interest not to have the fund attacked. I maintain that this Bill has been drafted in such a way as to make it a perfect enigma to the lay mind. The right hon. Gentleman has given himself up to the study of how to draft it so as to mystify us. No ordinary man can understand the meaning of these clauses, because they are drawn with a special view to his mystification. I maintain that if the Government had taken the price of produce as the standard it would have been a far safer arrangement for the tenant farmer. The effect of this Bill will be to raise the rent. That is the whole motive underlying the clause, and it is only right and proper that the people of Derry should know what their representative is doing. And I shall be very much mistaken if Serjeant Donelan has not something to say about this matter in twelve months time. I say the principle underlying the Bill is to increase the rental of the Irish farmer, and viewing the matter in that light I have endeavoured here to keep back this measure as far as it has been possible for me to do, of course in a constitutional and proper manner. I think it is my bounden duty to do so. I think I see in this Bill the elements of danger to the tenant farmers in Ireland, and because I believe I see that, I shall strongly oppose the proposals of this clause. If the Amendment moved by the hon. Member for Dublin on behalf of the hon. Member for North Louth had been accepted, it would have modified the clause to some extent; it would not have made it perfect, because it would be impossible to make it a good clause by any change whatsoever, but to an extent it would have modified its vicious character. Another proposal which I think was deserving of more consideration from the Committee than it received was that of the Member for East Mayo. The proposal as it read looked like a puzzle, but the meaning of the Amendment in plain Saxon language was that, in coming to a calculation as to the reduction of rents, the reduction given in consequence of the improvements of the tenants should not be taken into consideration, and I will tell the Committee why——

*THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! I do not think the hon. Member is in order in going through the Amendments which have been rejected by the Committee.

MR. MURNAGHAN: This is part of the clause that I am dealing with, and when I introduced this subject I said I wanted to show why the clause should be rejected. I want to show where the principle is wrong, and that it is unjust to reduce the tithe rent-charge upon a reduction of rental; that it should be based on the tenant's interest in his farm. That is to say, where the rent has been reduced from £100 to £60, and it has been reduced by £30 on account of improvements and £10 in consequence of the fall in prices of agricultural produce, in arriving at the calculation of the amount of tithe rent-charge the £30 reduction on account of improvements should not be considered. That is what I wish the Committee to understand. The House is at present empty, and it does not matter much what I say, but I should like the country to understand that what this clause proposes to do—instead of basing the calculation for the payment of tithes on the landlord's interest in the land—is to base the calculation upon both the landlord's and tenant's interest in it, thereby putting a premium on rack-renting, and giving to the men who rack-rented the people in the past an advantage over the men who charged a fair and reasonable rent. The proposal is one which has no justice in it. On the clause as a whole I believe that the right hon. Gentleman might alter it in such a way as to remedy what I consider is a very serious defect, and that is that the tithe-payer benefits by the exorbitant rents of days gone by. That proposal cannot be defended. It is a financial fraud, which the Committee should not sanction. I suppose it is too late now to ask the right hon. Gentleman to reconsider the position. He has made up his mind that when he brings to the Committee, or the House, a proposal, we must take that proposal as it is. We must take all or none, because the right hon. Gentleman believes that he is so excellent a legislator that he can do no wrong. He is not responsible to the people against whom that wrong is committed; at present he is Chief Secretary for Ireland, but in two years from now he may have no connection with Ireland, and the period during which he held the office of Chief Secretary will only appear to him in the light of a nightmare or a disagreeable dream. I believe this clause will injure my constituents, and, earnestly believing that, I ask the Committee to reject it.

MR. FLYNN said he quite agreed with the hon. Member for Tyrone, Mid. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had declined to alter the clause by a single syllable, and, against the wishes of the representatives of the majority of the Irish people, had forced upon the Committee a Bill they did not desire. With regard to the clause itself the opinion of Ireland was well known. The Bill was a bad and unjust one, and this particular clause was one of the worst features of it. Irish Members during the course of the discussion had endeavoured to persuade the right hon. Gentleman that if there was to be a change in the tithe rent-charge, that change should be based on prices and not upon rents. The right hon. Gentleman has said it would be very difficult to alter the present basis. But he recalled the attention of the Committee to the fact that the rents themselves had been altered in consequence of the fall in prices of agricultural produce. In 1887, when it became necessary to reduce rents, judicial rents were based on prices. Why then should it be impossible to adopt the same system in the variation of the tithe rent-charge? His own opinion was that the Government, either at the inspiration or the instigation of the landlords, had refused to take prices as a basis for the simple reason that judicial rents were greater, and therefore they selected that basis which would bring the greatest benefit. On comparing county with county and poor law union with poor law union it would be found that wherever rack-renting had been most prevalent the largest share of this reduction would go to the landlords, and that where the landlords had reduced their rents, in some cases to the extent of 50 per cent., voluntarily, they got the smallest share of the reduction. Irish Members had endeavoured to impress on the right hon. Gentleman that the differentiation of the reductions ought to be taken into consideration, that the reductions of rent due to the fall of prices should be charged, but not reductions which were due to improvements made by the tenants; but no change, alteration, or reform was made in the clause. All suggestions from the Irish representatives were refused. Why should 1886 be selected as the basis? Were not reductions made in earlier years? In 1883 and 1884 the reduction of judicial rents was much smaller than it was subsequently. It was not recognised at that time that the depression in agriculture was likely to be permanent, but when that conviction became impressed upon the Land Commission it was found necessary to make very much larger reductions. From 1886 onwards the reductions were larger all over Ireland. That meant that the Government, in selecting 1886 instead of an earlier year, gave the largest possible measure of reduction in the tithe rent-charges. That was obvious to the plainest and meanest intelligence. Why should the Land Commissioners have this work thrown upon them? Was their work not sufficiently heavy? He did not wish to defend the Land Commissioners, or to be too careful regarding the work thrown upon them. They were pretty well paid, and they had a pretty large staff. The Committee should not overlook the consideration that the Land Commissioners were the trustees of the Church Fund. He did not suppose, of course, that in fixing judicial rents and in working up statistics they would do anything willingly of an improper character; but, on the other hand, it must be obvious to the Committee that they were placing this body in a very anomalous position. They were the trustees of the Church Fund, and necessarily their interest was that the Fund should be kept intact, or that the drain upon it should be as small as possible. If the reduction of judicial rents was fixed at a high figure then the Fund would be drawn upon to a larger extent. If the judicial rents were raised, then, of course, the tithe was raised, and there was no reduction of the Church Fund. He thought the Land Commission was the worst body that could possibly be entrusted with the duty of compiling the statistics. Bad as the Bill was, Clause 2 was one of the worst features of it. It contained almost every vicious principle a clause could contain. First of all the tenant's improvements were not recognised in the judicial rent, and on the tenant's improvements it was proposed to give the tithe-rent payers a reduction. If they did give these tithe-rent payers this reduction—he could never see where the demand came from—at any rate, the principle should be applied in the most equitable manner. Why should they include the tenant's improvements in giving the reduction? It appeared to him that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary thought it a portion of his duty to come to the House and throw a complicated Irish Bill on the Table, and say to the Irish Members, "There is no use talking or telling us what the public opinion of Ireland is. There it is; you must accept it, no matter how much the Irish people may protest." It must be passed over their heads by means of his mechanical majority and by having recourse to those gagging measures which were so frequently denounced by the Tory party ten or twelve years ago.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.) regretted that the Chief Secretary had not seen his way to accept some of the Amendments which had been moved. He believed that, instead of being an injury, they would have been a great benefit to the Bill. The landlords thought they were making an excellent bargain by accepting the arrangement introduced by Mr. Gladstone at the time of the passing of the Church Act, but it appeared that prices had fallen since then, and of course the right hon. Gentleman had brought in this Bill to give them relief. When the tenant farmers of Ireland wanted assistance, the right hon. Gentleman replied that it required legislation, but he was not very slow to bring in legislation to enable the Irish landlords to scoop in a million of Irish money. That was not to be wondered at considering that they had a landlord in the War Office, a landlord as manager of the General Post Office, while the representative of the very largest landlord in Ireland—namely, Trinity College—held the office of Solicitor General for England. He did not wonder at all that this Bill had been introduced, and that this clause, which was going to work such a great injustice against the people of Ireland, was insisted on. The Chief Secretary for Ireland seemed to think that the Land Commission could not make a mistake. A most remarkable thing had come to his knowledge. The chief of the Irish Land Commission, Mr. Justice Bewley, had stated that the rents fixed for the first term were altogether too high. Those rents affected 200,000 tenants, and the Commission, in attempting to remedy the injustice done to them, fixed the amounts too high. Was it not possible that the Commission might also make mistakes in the future? He, for one, could have no confidence whatever in the Irish Land Commission, and particularly when he looked at the Commission from this standpoint. There had been a Tory Government in office now for five years; another Tory Government would appoint no one else but supporters of, and sympathisers with, the landlords. If that was so, how could the tenants expect to get justice from a tribunal largely composed of landlords? The Land Commission would be manned by supporters of the landlords, and it was only natural to expect that the Irish Church Fund would not be able to supply all the demand that would be made upon it with regard to tithes in future. This Bill was based on the assumption that if there was even a greater reduction in prices in the next fifteen years a larger slice would be given to the landlords. He could not for the life of him see that the Land Commission was a proper tribunal to be entrusted with this work in future. He thought the right hon. Gentleman would be well advised if he dropped this clause altogether. Looking to the admitted fact that the Land Commission had made mistakes, it would be a very wrong thing for the House to leave such a measure as this in the hands of that Commission in future.

MR. DOOGAN supported the hon. Member for South Monaghan in asking that the clause be dropped. If the clause were based on a standard that would allow a proportionate share of the spoil to be carried off, by each landlord, it would not be such a bad principle. There was no connection at all between tithe rent-charge and the reduction of rents in Ireland. Suppose that it was proposed to deal with tithe rents in England on the basis of the reductions of rent which had taken place from economic causes, the matter would receive very scant discussion in that House. He had just been speaking to an English landlord, who told him that he had reduced his rents 25 per cent. If all the tithe-rent payers had their charges brought down to a quarter, he did not know how such a revolutionary proposal would be received in that House. The proposal in the Bill amounted to a premium upon rack-renting. The more the landlords rack-rented their tenants, and the higher they had raised their rents in the past, the greater the amount they would get under this clause from the Irish Church Fund. That fund was applied by statute to the relief of distress, and for educational and other purposes in Ireland. It had not at any time been drawn upon in order to subsidise a class as it was now. That drain would at least amount to one million, and very possibly it would much exceed that sum. The money would do a great deal of good if applied in grants to lunatic asylums, and for other purposes that the ratepayers were crying out about. He was surprised to find from the statistics quoted by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division that in Ulster the reductions in rents during the first and second statutory terms amounted to something like 60 per cent. The hon. Member showed how much the other provinces had fallen below that immense reduction. The hon. Member for North Fermanagh tried to explain those large reductions by stating that Ulster was the most agricultural province in Ireland, and that the grass lands were much less reduced tillage farms. The hon. Member for East Mayo, however, had stated that when the tithe was paid on the basis of corn—the prices of wheat and other grain, which formed the proper basis—a smaller proportion was obtained in Ulster per acre than in any of the other provinces. Therefore the explanation about its being more agricultural than the other provinces could not stand. He thought he could explain the reason, and enough importance had not been attached to it during the debate. The Land Acts legalised the Ulster custom, which gave to tenant farmers in that province the right to their own improvements. This entitled the tenants to go into court and claim reductions in respect of buildings, fences, drainage works, and everything else done upon the farm, either by themselves or their predecessors, and also in respect of the state of cultivation. The land system in Ulster was different and peculiar as compared with that in the other provinces. The landlords of Ulster were bound by their charters and titles to let the land at low prices to the tenants. The landlords increased the low rents to an enormous figure, and when the Ulster system was recognised by law the tenants got the benefit of all their improvements. In the other provinces the Ulster custom did not prevail, and all the improvements had to be specified on the back of the claim. If the lawyer acting for a tenant overlooked any items of the case, the tenant lost his claim for such improvements as were omitted. Besides, under the Land Acts the claim for tenants other than Ulster could not extend back beyond a certain number of years. Hence a larger reduction would be made to the landlords of Ulster because of their confiscation of the improvements which the hard-working tenants had made on the land. This Bill thus sets a premium on wrong-doing. The worst rack-renting and evicting landlords who did injustice to their tenants, and who actually carried off such large spoils before, were now to be allowed an additional sum as the result of the cruel wrongs which they did to their tenants in the past—wrongs which necessitated the compulsory reductions on which they now base their claim for redress. The Ulster landlords would derive more benefit than good landlords, who charged their tenants moderate live-and-thrive rents. When the Chief Secretary wanted to give his friends and supporters a dole, he should have cast around for a standard by which some fairness in the distribution of the spoil would be got. This money did not come out of the Imperial Treasury, but out of an Irish Fund. Therefore, it should be used to further develop technical education and other beneficent purposes in Ireland. He had great pleasure in supporting his colleague on that side of the House who had advocated the rejection of this clause.

MR. POWER said that if there were to be variations they ought to be those suggested by the Amendment rather than those which the Bill proposed to set up. He was sorry to say that none of the suggestions put forward by his hon. friend the Member for North Dublin and the hon. Member for North Louth had been accepted, and the clause now stood before them in all its nakedness and with all the objections with which it was originally printed. He objected to this clause because he thought that, even from a Conservative point of view, it contained a very dangerous principle, which violated in the most glaring manner some of the essential rights of property. It was extremely unjust to Ireland that this Church Fund should be attacked, and he could see no justification whatever for this clause. He thought the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool had proved beyond yea or nay that this proposal would work most unjustly, and that the landlords who had been considerate towards their tenants would derive little or no benefit from it, while in those districts where rack-renting had been the order of the day, the landlords would largely benefit. For that reason he did not think the clause should receive the approval of the House. He knew that there was not very much hope of them being able to beat the Government, but they had the satisfaction of knowing that the vast majority of Irish opinion and Irish Members were opposed to this principle. Perhaps because the vast majority of the Irish representatives were opposed to it was the very reason why this House would approve of it. The very fact that the majority of the Irish Members were in favour of any proposition was enough to secure a majority against it in this House.

MR. DILLON said that this was one of the most important clauses in the Bill, for it proposed to introduce a totally new principle entirely unknown to the Statute-book of this country, and that was that the tithe rent-charge should be varied in proportion to the rent obtained from an occupier. It was preposterous for the Chief Secretary for Ireland to reply that there was a principle of variability involved. Supposing they admitted, for the sake of argument, that there was a principle of variability in tithes originally. That variability never was founded upon the variability of rent, and that was what made him so angry when the Government sought to rush this measure through the House in the dark as it were. They were introducing a proposal which was absolutely unheard of before in their history. The system of variability introduced was never heard of in the whole civilised world until the present time. He had a few facts which he wished to lay before the House in reference to the new standard which had been set up. Before the Acts of 1820 and 1830 the tithe was one-tenth of the produce of the land, or it should have been. The whole subject was enormously complicated, but in the year 1820, under the Goulborne Acts, a small modicum of the tithe was put back upon the grazing land. At that time tithe had no relation whatever to rent. When the great settlement had been carried through under the Goulborne Acts, and when the composition was being carried out throughout Ireland before 1838, they would find upon examining the question more closely that the evidence given before the Tithe Commission of 1831 showed that tithe had no relation to rent. Even in the old days tithes had no relation to rent and never had, and to make tithes variable according to the rent was a most extraordinary principle, without any precedent whatever. The Government had made up their mind to break up the settlement of 1872, which was a solemn statutory settlement, for some reasons of political expediency. To break up that settlement and to vary the tithes they had to adopt a new principle, and they contended that the most convenient principle was the scale which they had set up. That scale might be convenient, but it was singularly unjust and unreasonable. He would mention a simple case as an illustration of the futility and the unreasonableness of the scale proposed in this clause. A relative of his possessed some property which was liable to tithes. As well as he could recollect, that property used to pay in tithes £12 or £12 10s. a year. It was divided into two equal portions—one was in the hands of his relative, and the other was let to another landlord under a head-rent of £25 a year. The whole of the property was liable to tithe. How would the clause work in this case? Half the property was let to a middleman. If the rents to the occupiers were reduced, under this plan of dealing with the tithes the rent of the middleman was raised, while the head-rent landlord would get his tithes reduced, and he would get the whole benefit from the reduction of the rent of the tenant. Simply because some other man's rent was reduced, they would get the benefit by a reduction of the tithes. This was something like the custom adopted by the ancient French kings, who used to have some other unfortunate boy brought up and punished when their own sons did anything wrong. The Bill itself was very curiously drafted, and he desired to point out that when they had passed this clause they had not decided the question of the variability of any tithe rent-charge in Ireland. That would remain an open question. Furthermore, the measure attempted to deal with two subjects which were utterly foreign to each other. It also professed to set up a standard for the variation of ecclesiastical tithes, which had been invariable in Ireland since 1872. He thought that was a great blot on the Bill. He only alluded to this point for the purpose of showing that when this clause was passed they had not decided anything as regarded the variability of the tithes, and that the whole question could be reopened on the next clause.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Captain Donelan and Mr. Patrick O'Brien.

Clause 3 :—

MR. CLANCY said the object of the Amendment he rose to move, was to continue the existing law which provided that an application must be made to a court of competent jurisdiction, and on the application of any person entitled he must prove certain things. If he is an owner of tithe rent-charge he must prove his title. If he is a payer of tithe rent-charge he must prove that he is a person charged within the meaning of certain Acts of Parliament. There was the question of giving notice. Notice must have been regarded at one time as being of very great importance. The notices had to be served at a certain period of the year, and oftentimes mistakes were made by not selecting the proper time for serving those notices. They had to be posted on parish churches, and the requirements as to the posting of notices was a very detailed affair. The notice had to be posted on the parish church, on the outer door, and not only that, but on the principal outer door of the parish church. Sometimes there was not an outer door, a principal outer door, or any outer door at all, and sometimes there was not even a church. In a few cases it was thought advisable to erect a door in order to escape the consequences of insufficient posting. That might be a reason for substituting this automatic process, but those who took that view were not thinking of the tithe-payers. He wished to submit to the House the view of the tithe-owners. They consisted of two classes whose interests were diametrically opposite, and it must be borne in mind that the tithe-owners in one respect occupied a position analogous to the landlords. It must be borne in mind that this tithe rent-charge had, for a very long time, been treated as an article of commerce. Tithes had been bought and sold for valuable consideration from time to time. In some instances trustees had invested money in them, and they were considered to be a very good security. Now the Government proposed to substitute for the present system of varying tithes an automatic process of variation, and that was doing a great injustice to everybody who had bought tithe rent-charges in the past. He ventured to say that those purchasers were paid no consideration whatever in this Bill, and this proposal was grossly unjust to them. It was perfectly manifest that these tithe rent-charges were valuable or were not valuable accordingly as they were supposed to be variable or not variable. People bought them on the supposition that it was very difficult to vary them, and they paid their money on that basis. And now the Government, which was supposed to be especially conservative in regard to the rights of property, passed by all these considerations. In the case of the tithes bought upon the supposition he had alluded to, the Government proposed to make the variation according to the reduction of the judicial rents. He hoped the supporters of the Government, the landed gentry of England and the upholders of the rights of private property, in this country would reflect upon the reckless injury they were inflicting upon the people who had bought these tithes, for if they did he did not think they could reconcile their consciences to believe that they were acting up to their principles of doing justice to the owners of this property. This Bill was not only a revolutionary measure, but a measure of great injustice, and the landlords who were calling for it might find themselves some time or other in the future in a great difficulty. They might be faced with a similar proposal from some other Government, and they had better be very careful as to the way they were now satisfying themselves that they were able to give a reasonable defence for a proposal of this kind. He had heard no defence whatever for this legislation. Being a lover of justice, he thought the tithes ought to be continued as they were at present, and he begged to move his Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 26, after the word 'Act,' to insert the words 'on the application of any person who, if this Act had not been passed, would have been entitled to obtain a variation of any tithe rent-charge.'"—(Mr. Clancy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR said he could hardly think that the Amendment was seriously intended by the hon. Member, for he had actually suggested that the tithe-owner had got a vested interest in the tithes. He would remind the Committee of one of the difficulties which the hon. Member himself had raised. It was necessary, under the existing law, to post the notice at the parish church. In some parishes there was no church, and in such a parish no variation of tithes was possible. And yet the hon. Member came forward and suggested that the tithe-owner had got a vested interest in the continuance of the tithe. If that was his opinion, all he had to say was that a great deal of the legislation passed upon this subject was unnecessary. The hon. Member called himself a lover of justice, but according to his theory the Act of 1881 and other Acts should not have been placed upon the statute book, because if purchases were made upon the supposition that certain disabilities had never been removed, upon what principles of justice could the Act of 1881 be defended? In England tithes were variable automatically, and they proposed to do the same thing under this Bill, and by doing so he thought they were initiating a great reform.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.) said that the tithe-owners were not members of the landlord class. For many years investments in tithes had been looked upon as one of the most valuable securities. If the serious attack now proposed was made upon this property, surely those investors ought also to be compensated. The proposal before the Committee was by no means a frivolous one, for it provided that those men should be protected in every possible way. The owners of tithes had a primary charge on the land, and anyone acquainted with the law of real property knew they had a right to be paid out of profits, and any derogation of their right was a serious inroad on the rights of property. The effect of this clause would be to militate against that security. Therefore, he asked the Committee to insist upon this Amendment, or else that the Attorney General should give some reasons or show in some sort of way how the security could be maintained.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—Sir William Walrond and Mr. Anstruther.

MR. DILLON: I propose to move not the Amendment standing in my name, but the Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for North Louth. We have now come to one of the important questions raised by Amendment on this Bill, and in order to make clear the bearing of this Amendment I must recall to the attention of the Committee the scope and object of the Bill. There are in Ireland two classes of tithes, ecclesiastical tithes and lay impropriate tithes. The ecclesiastical tithes are paid to the Irish Land Commission, and form a large part of the revenue of the Church Fund, but the lay impropriate tithes are private property just as much as a mortgage or a head rent. The ecclesiastical tithes have been invariable in Ireland since the Act of 1872, but it is proposed in this Bill to make them variable. The lay impropriate tithes have always been invariable. Although I do not at all agree that it is desirable or defensible to violently alter the variation in the case of lay tithes, still I admit that lay tithe-owners have a grievance, and that that grievance has arisen not from the deliberate action of Parliament, but from a blunder on the part of the Executive Government in Ireland. If people are deprived of a legal right, whatever the value of that right may be, they are undoubtedly entitled to come to Parliament and ask for a remedy. But that argument does not apply to the case of ecclesiastical tithes, and the effect of this Amendment would be to confine the operations of Sections 2 and 3 of this Bill to lay impropriate tithes, leaving the ecclesiastical tithes invariable as they are at present and have been for twenty-eight years. It appears to me that this Amendment ought to receive the support of Her Majesty's Government. I may point out that I myself intended to approach the subject in a different way, because the Amendment standing in my name would have produced the opposite effect, but that arose altogether from the fact that I was not allowed to move an Instruction which I think was a wise Instruction, to divide the Bill into two parts, as the subjects dealt with are absolutely different. Under the circumstances, however, I now move the Amendment of the hon. Member for North Louth, which proposes to confine the operation of the Bill to lay impropriate tithes, and to leave the ecclesiastical tithes as they are now, invariable. We have heard a great deal of argument from the right hon. Gentleman — and very poor argument it appeared to me—in favour of the omission of the seven years instalments, and he based his argument in favour of that view on the assertion that there was a miscalculation, and that these annuitants were in point of fact unknowingly defrauded by Parliament owing to the ignorance of Mr. Gladstone and the Treasury of that day. But that argument cannot apply to the case of the ecclesiastical tithe-owners, and there can be no misunderstanding concerning them. It is said that there was no consent, but anyone who will take the trouble to trace through the pages of Hansard the history of the Act of 1872 cannot maintain that the tithe-payers of Ireland were not consenting parties. Neither in the House of Lords nor in the House of Commons was one solitary voice raised against the provisions of the Act of 1872 which made ecclesiastical tithes invariable, although there were dozens of Irish landlords in both Houses. How can the right hon. Gentleman come forward now, after twenty-eight years, and tell us that an injustice has been done? Up to the present moment we have not heard one single argument in support of that proposition. What is the nature of the ecclesiastical tithes as fixed by the Act of 1872 with—as should never be forgotten—the consent of the tithe-payers? All that the right hon. Gentleman has said about the inherent variability of tithes is absurd and in direct conflict with the facts of the situation. By the Act of 1872 ecclesiastical tithes were fixed invariably as a first charge on land in Ireland, a charge which bore no relation to the amount of the rent, and under which in innumerable instances great interests were held. Under that charge there were very often a head rent, middle interests, and perhaps two or three other interests, not to speak of mortgages. This Amendment now brings us to the great principle which I asserted on the Second Reading of this Bill, namely, the principle of the inviolability of prior charges on land. I want to know, when there is this invariable statutory prior lien on the land of Ireland, by what right can you slip over intermediate charges, and now maintain that this prior lien must be reduced. What about mortgages or family charges or head rents? This is of the utmost importance in Ireland. In this country, so far as my knowledge goes, no class has raised an agitation in favour of the reduction of the interest or the capital of mortgages on land, or the reduction of superior rents in consequence of the reduction of rent to the immediate occupier. If by this clause you allow the principle of violability to apply to a charge on land which ranks before head rent and mortgage interest, then you are introducing one of the most revolutionary principles of legislation ever proposed in this House. You cannot plead ignorance of the result. We know what the landlords think of this Bill, and we are not left for a single moment under the delusion that they will accept it as final. They scorn it and they scoff at it, and they regard it as an infinitesimal concession, only valuable as recognising their right to compensation.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is going rather beyond the limits of his own Amendment. He is now discussing the Bill at large.

MR. DILLON: This Amendment goes to the root of the principle of tithe rent-charge.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Gentleman is not discussing that; he is discussing whether the landlords of Ireland will ask for more and so forth, and that is not within the scope of his own Amendment.

MR. DILLON: In discussing this Amendment I am discussing whether the principle of variation is to be applied to ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge in Ireland, and whether a first charge on the land of Ireland is to be declared variable. The reason why I allude to this question is because I believe we have come to that part of the Bill in which the main principle of the inviolability of first charges on land is concerned, and I am astonished if I am not at liberty to discuss that great principle. The clause, as a whole, violates that principle, and it is on this Amendment that we can specifically discuss the question whether we are to vary tithes which at present by statute are invariable. It appears to me that if this Amendment raises any question it raises this precise question—whether we are going by this Bill to abrogate a great fixed principle which affects the whole security of property in Ireland. Unquestionably, that would be the result. If you break down the fixed and useful principle that charges on land must be treated according to priority, and that a man with superior interests is not to be made to suffer because an interest below him is cut down, you open the flood-gates and the floods will rush in; you will be face to face with an ever-growing demand from landlords in Ireland to have mortgages and the other liens on their lands cut down, and they will quote this very clause as a precedent. I object, of course, to this proposal because of the deadly blow it will strike at the solvency and the very existence of the Church Fund, and if I dwelt on other reasons it was because our experience during the last two or three days has led us to believe that the vast majority of hon. Members are entirely indifferent to all arguments on that point, and I thought we might make some lodgment in the minds of hon. Members if we showed that if this principle is trampled on a precedent will be set which may have the most injurious effects on mortgages and other charges on land. For these reasons I urge the acceptance of the Amendment on the Committee.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 28, after the word 'payable,' to insert the words 'otherwise than to the Land Commission.'"—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Of course it is quite impossible for the Government to accept this Amendment. If we did we would strike at one of the principal provisions of the measure. The hon. Member for East Mayo, if he will allow me to say so, has entirely misunderstood the grounds on which the Government have urged that the ecclesiastical tithe rent fixed by the Act of 1872 should again be made variable. The essential point is that the ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge, like other tithe rents in Ireland, was variable before 1872. It ceased to be variable under peculiar circumstances. It was not, I maintain, the result of a bargain between the tithe-payers, on one hand, and Mr. Gladstone representing the interests of the Church Fund on the other, in which the landlords got their quid pro quo. The real fact is that this change was made by Mr. Gladstone with a view to facilitating the redemption of tithe rent-charge by the payers of ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge. He believed that they would take advantage of the opportunity he proposed to give them, and for that purpose he fixed a tithe rent-charge, never contemplating, in the first place, that a very large number of payers would not take advantage of this facility to redeem, and, in the second place, that an abnormal fall in agricultural values would take place within a generation. It is on these grounds that we have advocated the removal of an arrangement which has operated against tithe rent-payers in a way never contemplated at the time. I do not advocate that tithe rent-charge should be reduced because rents have been reduced; but I say that under the peculiar circumstances of the case it is equitable that tithe rent-charge payers should be again entitled to have their tithe rent-charge varied while the privilege of redeeming is taken away from them. On that ground, and on that ground alone, I am advocating this change. As I said on the Second Reading, the hardship of the present situation is emphasised by the fact that rents have since been com-pulsorily reduced; but it is not on that ground I advocate it, but on the grounds I have explained to the Committee. We are taking the reduction in judicial rents as the measure, but not as the reason for this proposal.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): I certainly shall support the Amendment, which will strike out of the Bill the variation of ecclesiastical tithes. The Bill as it now stands deals with two different classes of property—lay and ecclesiastical tithes. The Amendment only refers to ecclesiastical tithes, and the effect of it if carried out would be to restore the state of things which existed when the Church Amendment Act of 1872 was passed—namely, to make ecclesiastical tithes irrevisable. That is the principle of the Amendment, and I think it is essential on various grounds that it should be accepted. In the Act of 1899 establishing the Board of Agriculture the right hon. Gentleman, when charging £70,000 a year for the purposes of that Act upon the Church Fund, was obliged to guard against the effect of that charge, because it was even then contemplated by the Government that the Church Fund might not be adequate to meet it.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I may remind the right hon. Gentleman that last year the Tithe Bill was introduced at the same time as the Board of Agriculture Bill.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL: Yes; but the Tithe Rent-charge Bill was a still-born child, and that does not apply to my argument at all. I will quote the Agriculture and Technical Instruction (Ireland) Act, 1899. Section 15 says that, among the moneys placed at the disposal of the Department, should be—

"(b.) Out of the annual income derivable from the surplus of the Irish Church Temporalities Fund, during a period of fifteen years from the commencement of this Act, the annual sum of £70,000, and thereafter during each subsequent period of fifteen years such annual sum as in the opinion of the Treasury can be paid without impairing the security for any liabilities existing at the commencement of this Act upon that Fund."

When the argument was made last year that the Government were by that Act, when granting the sum of £70,000 a year to the Department, impairing the security of the Imperial Exchequer, the right hon. Gentleman stated that it was only for a period of fifteen years, and that it was not likely that the fund would be diminished in fifteen years, and that if the grant was extended beyond fifteen years, it could only be done under the saving clause, with the consent of the Treasury of the day if in their opinion it could be paid without impairing the Church Fund. The right hon. Gentleman says that our fears are chimerical, and that, though we are depleting the Church Fund by this Bill to the extent of a million and a half or two millions, there will be no risk and no necessity for making good the security to the Imperial Exchequer. Hon. Gentlemen opposite should bear in mind that these vast loans have been made for various purposes out of the Imperial Exchequer on the security of the Church Fund, and that if the Church Fund fails the repayment will fall on the taxpayers in every part of the country. That is the reason why we should not undo the settlement of 1872, and should leave unimpaired the fixed and constant fund provided by the Church Amendment Act. The right hon. Gentleman says that this was a question of policy, of haute politique—the facilitating of the redemption of the tithe rent-charge; but last night he put it on the ground of a miscalculation, of a sort of "hocus pocus," about £3 10s. per cent. for fifty-two years instead of forty-five. Mr. Gladstone, who was a most jealous custodian of the public Treasury, made it a fixed and constant sum, and he did so to facilitate the redemption by paying cash down twenty-two and a half years purchase, or a terminable annuity for fifty-two years calculated at £4 9s. To attempt to cast a slur on the memory of the greatest statesman of this century seems to me extraordinary. There is another point. It is said that the reason for making this great change after the expiration of thirty years, and reducing the tithe rent-charge, is because the rents have been reduced by the operation of special legislation. For my part I do not want to be misunderstood, but I think that the Land Acts have operated harshly upon many of the landlords of Ireland who have had their rents considerably reduced, and it would rejoice me beyond measure if compensation were made to these landlords out of a proper fund, but not out of this fund, which was by solemn Act of Parliament reserved for cases of "unavoidable calamity and suffering in Ireland." The fallacy underlying this particular clause which we are seeking to amend is, that it assumes that all the rents of all the landlords in every county in Ireland have been reduced. That is a great fallacy. I know many estates, and curiously enough in Tipperary particularly, where there are many tenants who have never come into the Land Court, and who have never had their rents reduced; and yet the landlords of these tenants are to have the benefit of this clause under the guise of compensation for loss incurred by the reduction of rents under Mr. Gladstone's Land Act. The right hon. Gentleman does not want to throw a glamour over the House. He is too fair, too loyal, too candid to do that, and accordingly he says that it is not because of the reduction of rents, but because of high policy, that this Bill has been introduced. I maintain that the reduction of the rent has no application at all to this particular standard as to ecclesiastical tithe with which alone we are dealing with this Amendment. The tithe rent-charge, which represents the tithe, was never the property of the landlord; it was something cut away from his property. The owners in fee, the grantees of the Crown, the possessors of fee simple estates in Ireland, never had more than nine-tenths of what their estates were nominally worth, because the Church had acquired the other tenth. The tithe rent-charge is like a mortgage, a first charge on the estate, and what the landlord ever had was simply the surplus. The rent was never measured by prices in Ireland. There were various other elements in fixing the rents—contiguity to market, richness of the soil, the hardship of the landlord, the poverty of the tenant, the land-hunger which prevailed, and which was the source of so many of the social evils of Ireland. The tithe rent-charge was measured by the market prices of the staple cereals, wheat and oats, which were the great tithes, in the language of the law, the lesser tithes being payable in respect of the cows and pigs, and the like. The great tithes, which were the staple of the income of the incumbent, were properly regulated by the market prices of the cereals. The right hon. Gentleman is quite right in saying that this solatium was not to be given by the Bill in consequence of the reduction of rents, but because of the general hardships in the case of many landlords, who, instead of having three or four mansions, have only one or two, and enjoying a London season, were obliged to put up with one in Dublin.

Serjeant Hemphill.

Mr. T. P. O'CONNOR: We certainly intend to go to a division on this Amendment, and I see no reason why it should not be taken before twelve o'clock; but I wish to express a slight point of difference from my hon. friend the Member for East Mayo, who said that there is a possibility of the precedent of this Bill being followed, and of some interference being made with mortgages and other charges on land and other property in Ireland. I beg my hon. friend to relieve his mind in regard to that. I do not believe that the House of Commons will ever submit to any such a proposal. And for this reason. If the Chief Secretary got up and proposed a reduction on the mortgages on property in Ireland on the ground that as the rents in Ireland had been reduced, so the mortgages should be reduced in proportion, the representatives of the English insurance companies and English capitalists would raise such a cry of anguish and revolt that the right hon. Gentleman would not have the smallest chance of carrying his Bill beyond the first night when it was mentioned in the House of Commons. I can assure my hon. friend that these charges on property in Ireland are perfectly secure. But why is it that this particular form of reduction is attempted to be carried out? It is because the Government are interfering, not with English money, but with Irish money, not with English capital, but with the rights of the Irish poor. It is because of that that the Chief Secretary has the solid vote of the gentlemen behind him. Even if I had the high privilege of being insured in some of the excellent English and Scottish insurance companies, I would gladly see Irish landlords who had borrowed money from them get 50 per cent. of their indebtedness wiped out, because it was the eagerness and promptitude of these companies in lending money to the Irish landlords which largely led to their destruction. But the vivid anxiety of my hon. friend for the capital of English people is vain; it is a mere phantom. The reason for this raid on Ireland is that it is Irish money. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Armagh quotes the Act of 1872, and he really has the courage to say that that Act was an injustice to the landlords of Ireland. He was in the House at the time, and supported the Bill. If he did not vote for the Church Bill, at any rate he voted for the Land Bill, and the right hon. and gallant Gentleman will bear me out when I say, founding myself upon what appears in the colourless pages of Hansard, that when Mr. Gladstone announced that he would give power by the Bill to the landlords to commute their tithes he was interrupted in the flow of his discourse, because this concession was such a surprise to the landlords that they could not refrain from expressing their sense of satisfaction.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): That is pure imagination.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: If my hon. and gallant friend will allow me to proceed, I will refer to Hansard to show that that was not an imaginary scene. Mr. Gladstone himself said that he was not able to proceed for a time with his speech because of the buzz of delighted surprise on the part of the landlords that he had been so kind to them. I observe the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not in the House. He usually is absent when this Bill is under discussion, or, if present, is always silent. But the right hon. Gentleman would confirm me, for he at that time got up and denounced Mr. Gladstone's proposal as a sacrilegious bribe by which the landlords were tempted to give up their theological and religious principles in exchange for the amount of money the right hon. Gentleman was going to give them. I am not acquainted with the law in regard to tithes in England, although I have made some inquiry on the subject. But, I ask, is there any power in England by which the English landlord can get rid of his tithe in the same way as the Irish landlord can get rid of his in Ireland? The right hon. and gallant Gentleman says that the Act of 1872 was an injustice to the Irish landlords, but he knows that that Bill was passed through both Houses of Parliament practically without discussion. I will tell the right hon. and gallant Gentleman something of the genesis of that Act. At that time rents were rising in Ireland, and landlords were supposed to be face to face with increased prices, and a corresponding increase of their tithes, and Mr. Gladstone, then Prime Minister, in order to save the landlords from that increase of their tithes, made the tithe rent charge stationary, which would otherwise have been augmented by the increase of prices. So that what the right hon. and gallant Gentleman represents as an injustice to Irish landlords was in fact one of the gifts—I do not say bribes, nor do I wish to indulge in the theological fantasies of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—by which Mr. Gladstone thought to smooth the passage of his land legislation, and to reconcile the Irish landlords to its acceptance.

IRISH LAND—CLAIMS OF IRISH LANDLORDS — PROPOSED ROYAL COMMISSION.

[RESOLUTION.]

VISCOUNT TEMPLETOWN : My Lords, in rising to move the resolution that stands in my name, I cannot hide from myself that I have undertaken a great responsibility, not only because your Lordships' vote to-day will be of vital importance to the Irish landlords, but because I believe it will be of supreme moment to the interests of all who own any property of any kind whatever in the British Empire, for whether it is the rich man's estate or the poor man's one or two acres, the principle at stake is the same. The resolution I am asking your Lordships to support to-day is based on the fact that Irish landlords have been, and are being, deprived of their property for public purposes, and, contrary to the universal custom in this country when such is the case, are receiving neither compensation nor redress. But, my Lords, I have been nerved to my task by the belief inherent in me that if the people of this country once recognise the existence of an injustice they will do all in their power to have it removed. I do not propose to occupy much of your Lordships' time to-day in details of the grievances of Irish landlords, because (as is stated in the resolution before us) our claim to compensation or redress has never been seriously disputed by Parliament, and because after your Lordships heard the late Lord Inchiquin's speech in July, 1899, in which he put forward the damages done to the Irish landlords by recent legislation, your Lordships passed the following resolution—

"That the question of compensation to the Irish landlords for injury inflicted upon them by recent legislation demands the immediate attention of Her Majesty's Government."

Since then, however, nothing has been done, so far as we know, by the Government to deal with this resolution ; but we recognise the fact that their hands have been full, and we did not, on our part, wish to interfere with their doing in South Africa that which we wish them to do also in Ireland—namely, to insist upon justice to all sections of the community. In asking for the appointment of a Royal Commission to inquire into the questions which are referred to in the motion which I have placed on the Paper of your Lordships' House, I think I ought at the outset to state once more, very briefly, the nature of the claim from which those questions arise. I cannot do so better than by quoting the following short paragraphs from a statement which was submitted to Her Majesty's Government by the Irish Landowners' Convention so long ago as 3rd February, 1888—

"The abstract right of Irish landowners to compensation for the loss or depreciation of their properties or rights by the legislation of recent years does not rest upon any new or exceptional grounds or principles.

"It is a right recognised and upheld in every civilised community, whenever property, or vested interests, are taken away or interfered with by the State for reasons of public policy, or for any public purpose.

"In England it has been for many generations an undisputed principle, rigorously enforced and continuously acted upon, sometimes at heavy cost to the nation, even in days when the country was comparatively poor.

"The legislature, moreover, has not only acted upon this principle in those cases in which the claim to compensation arose from the operation of great public measures or statutes, but it has always imposed a similar obligation upon public bodies, companies, or individuals to whom Parliament has, from time to time, delegated or granted powers of compulsorily acquiring or interfering with property, or vested interests, or rights of any kind.

"In such cases, moreover, compensation has frequently not been limited to the amount of loss or damage actually proved to have been inflicted at the moment, but large compensation has in many instances been paid for prospective, possible, or merely contingent damage or injury.

"The State has not only recognised this principle in its dealings with British subjects, but has in important instances both admitted and enforced a like obligation in dealing with other countries."

Such is the nature or basis of our claims, and I would next desire to remind your Lordships of some instances or occasions when this policy was acted upon or enforced. So long ago as 1705, when the terms of the Legislative Union between England and Scotland were being considered, the English Parliament agreed to pay £398,085 10s. as compensation for various losses which were regarded as likely to arise from that legislation. Again, in 1746, it was decided to abolish certain local Courts, known as exceptional hereditary jurisdictions, in Scotland, and a sum of about £150,000 was paid to the owners of these jurisdictions as compensation for the loss of their rights and emoluments. There was also the case of the revenues and royalties acquired by the State in the Isle of Man from the Duke and Duchess of Athol. This case is remarkable from the fact that it recognised the principle of paying compensation for injury arising from past legislation, when the injury proved to be greater than was expected when the legislation was passed. In 1765, £70,000 was paid to the Duke and Duchess, with an annuity of £2,000 per annum. Thirty-five years afterwards it was shown that the compensation was insufficient, and a further grant was made, which was subsequently converted into a perpetual annuity of £3,000. Finally, in 1829, the Duke was paid £417,144 for certain rights in and over the soil which had not been included in the previous transactions. We find also that, in 1799, the Parliament of Ireland voted £1,260,000 as compensation to the borough proprietors, when their rights were taken away. Then in 1833 the Imperial Parliament granted 20 millions sterling as compensation to the West Indian slave-owners, although it had been settled law in England for more than fifty years previously that property in man was unknown to our Constitution. The next instance of large compensation paid by the State to persons injuriously affected by legislation was probably the Irish Church Act of 1869, under which £11,616,518 was paid to individuals whose position or interests were adversely affected. Later on we had the case of abolition of purchase in the Army in 1871, when many millions of money were paid for depriving people of benefits which they had secured by a process which had actually been declared to be penal by statute. To these larger cases we have to add almost countless statutes under which power has been granted, sometimes to the State, sometimes to public or private companies, to take away the properties of individuals or to encroach upon their rights in pursuance of some public policy, or in the interest of some section of the community; but in no case that I know of has this been done without securing that compensation should be paid on a liberal scale to everyone who had to surrender or suffer anything, in property or rights, for the purposes of the legislation in question. I may, therefore, be asked, Why did not Parliament insert provisions in the Land Act of 1881, providing that the landlords should be compensated for any injury that might accrue to them from its operation? My reply is that it was asserted by Mr. Gladstone, and by the leading Members of his Government in both Houses of Parliament, that their Bill would benefit the Irish landlords instead of injuring them. For instance, on 25th April, 1881,* the late Mr. W. E. Forster, at that time Chief Secretary for Ireland, said—

"I therefore am not surprised to hear a claim made for compensation. But the English law in the matter depends upon whether damage can be proved, and my firm belief is that no damage can be proved; on the other hand, that if the landlord were compensated, you would compensate him for conferring on him a benefit."

Later on, on 22nd July, Mr. Forster again said—

"I think this Bill will be justified by what will happen, and I think the final result of the measure, within a few years, will be that the landowners of Ireland, small and large, will be better off than they are at this moment."

Again, on 1st August, 1881, Lord Carlingford said in this House—

"My Lords, I maintain that the provisions of this Bill will cause the landlords no money loss whatsoever."

And, on the 11th August, Lord O'Hagan said that—

"Another objection entertained by opponents of the Bill was that it would subject the landlords to certain losses. But he believed that if it were administered conscientiously and honestly no material injury would be done to the landlords."

But, my Lords, while the Government of 1881 maintained that their Bill would be no injury to the landlords, they were equally explicit in their assurances that if injury were the result, compensation must be made. For instance, on the Second Reading of the Bill, on 16th May, Mr. Gladstone said—

"I wish to refer to two words which we have heard often repeated in this debate. The first word is 'confiscation,' and the second word is 'compensation.' They are words that are, and ought to be, in close association together; for I certainly should be very slow to deny that where confiscation could be proved, compensation ought to follow."

* The proceedings on the Land Law (Ireland) Bill, of 1881, are reported in The Parliamentary Debates [Third Series], Vols. cclx.—cclxv.

Again, on 22nd July, Mr. Gladstone used these remarkable words—

"In doing our duty to the several classes in Ireland who are immediately affected by the Bill, we shall not forget the duty we owe to the nation at large. If these classes, either or both of them, have a just claim to compensation in consequence of the manner in which their interests will be affected by this Bill, we are bound as a Parliament to give it to them. . . . If it can be shown, on clear and definite experience at the present time, that there is a probability, or if after-experience should prove that in fact ruin and heavy loss is likely to be, or has been, brought upon any class in Ireland by the direct effect of this legislation, that is a question which we ought to look very directly in the face."

My Lords, I need not remind your Lordships that this line was taken, and these assurances were given, in the presence of this Imperial Parliament, and I should feel that I was offering almost an affront to both Houses if I appeared to entertain a moment's doubt that Parliament, in passing the Land Bill of 1881, identified itself in the fullest degree with the assurances thus given respecting it. If such assurances had been given respecting a measure affecting some class in one of our colonies or dependencies, would there be a moment's hesitation in recognising that pledges had been given which the English nation and the Imperial Parliament were in honour bound to redeem? If so, will it be contended that the obligation is less binding because it was given respecting the property and interests of a class who constitute no mean section of the population of the United Kingdom, and who at every period of their history have been remarkable for their loyalty and devotion to the people of England? My Lords, I turn next to the losses which we say have been inflicted upon us, and to the forms of compensation or redress which we have been demanding; both of which we now ask Her Majesty's Government to refer to examination by a Royal Commission. Our losses were accurately summarised by the late Lord Inchiquin, in this House, on the 18th July, 1899,* when he said that compensation was due to the Irish landlords in the following respects—

"(1) For the injury inflicted on them by being deprived of the right of resumption, and by the transfer from the landlord to the tenant of the right to the occupation of the soil; rent for their property, which solvent tenants would willingly pay ;

"(2) By the practical abolition of free contract in the letting of land;

"(3) By the landlords being deprived of the right of obtaining in the open market the best

* See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxiv., page 1129.

"(4) By the serious interference and diminution of the landlords' rights and income, by the arbitrary fixing of so-called fair rents ;

"(5) By the reduction of rents below anything that could be justified by economic causes ;

"(6) By the heavy legal expenses periodically entailed upon the landlords by the process of fixing their rents judicially ;

"(7) By the impediments which have been placed in the way of their obtaining even the rent which the State still allows them, while, at the same time, payment in full is enforced for tithe rent-charge and all other State charges ; and,

"(8) Generally, by the depreciation of the value of their property by legislation, as well as the deprivation of many valuable proprietary rights, the proper exercise of which was beneficial, not only to the landlords, but also to their tenants and to the community at large."

I ask your Lordships—do you believe there is one landowner in England who could fairly make these complaints ? Have English landlords lost the right of resumption of their holdings ? Has their land been transferred to their tenants for public purposes without compensation ? Have they been deprived of the right to let their farms for the best rent they can get ? Are their rents fixed below what could be explained by economic causes, and are they forced to let them at one-third below competition rents ? Let me quote one or two instances of the grievance I refer to, about rents being reduced below competition value. Judge Bewley's evidence before Mr. Morley's Committee proves this. He said—

"I would say that the fair rent of a holding, as a rule, would be, roughly, about two-thirds of the competition rent.—(Q.) Two-thirds of the competition rent ? Roughly. In many cases the fair rents would be, of course, less than two-thirds, but, generally speaking, I would take it in that way."

I venture to ask what sort of rents would landlords in England receive if Parliament compelled them to accept rents from which the element of competition was explicitly and wholly excluded ? Then, again, it is said, the fact that the tenants have done most of the improvements in Ireland justifies lower rents than would otherwise be fair, but the bottom is knocked out of that argument by the fact that rents have been reduced just as much, if not, indeed, more, in cases where it is not disputed that the improvements were done by the landlords. I could easily prove that landlords have to pay to get back possession of their own lands when no improvements have been claimed by the tenant, but I think I have said enough to show that it is not true to assert that the Irish landlords are no worse off than the English landlords. If the case of the English landlords is so similar to that of the Irish landlords, why are English farmers left without the advantages given to the Irish farmers, and why do not Irish landlords get compensation for the loss of their properties and rights as English landlords do ? Mr. Gladstone, speaking on February 15th, on the Irish Land Act of 1870,* laid it down that

"Inasmuch as perpetuity of tenure on the part of the occupier is virtually expropriation of the landlord, and as a mere re-adjustment of rent according to the price of produce can by no means dispose of all contingencies the future may produce in his favour, compensation would have to be paid to the landlord for the rights of which he would be deprived."

Was not this an admission that the virtual, indeed the actual, expropriation caused by the Act of 1881 is a ground for compensation, unless, indeed, it can be shown that the landlords have derived benefits from that Act which, in themselves, are tantamount to compensation ? If anyone is bold enough to assert this, I would remind him that on 22nd July, 1881, Mr. Gladstone also said—

"I quite agree that if Parliament were to pass a law providing that rents in Ireland should be universally reduced to Griffiths' valuation, that would be a fair case for compensation."

Now, during the ten years immediately following the passing of the Act of 1881, the Irish Land Commission published yearly the figures which enabled the public to see how the reduced rents stood with reference to Griffiths' valuation, and it appears that during the period ended 22nd August, 1891, the number of rents fixed by sub-commissioners was 145,332 ; the old rents in these cases amounted to £3,425,843 ; Griffiths' valuation of the holdings amounted to £2,583,038 ; and the rents were reduced by the sub-commissioners to £2,661,322. In other words, the old rents were, in the aggregate, 33 per cent. above Griffiths' valuation, while the rents fixed by the sub-commissioners were only 3 per cent. above the valuation. Manifestly, therefore, the administration of the Act had produced a state of things which Mr. Gladstone had deliberately selected as a test, the occurrence of which would entitle the landlords to compensation.

* See The Parliamentary Debates [Third Series], Vol. cxcix., page 350.

Do the Government dispute this? Mr. Arthur Balfour, speaking during the debate on the Act of 1881, said—

"Free sale must either end in rack-renting, or in robbery."

It has ended in both. What I have stated proves that the Irish landlords' property has been taken for public purposes, and that, contrary to custom, they have received no compensation for it, and this though leading statesmen of both parties considered them entitled to it. The justice of compensation or redress not having been disputed, it remains only a question of how our claim is to be dealt with, and it is to arrive at the solution of this question, and to put an end to the state of affairs described by the Times, when the Fry Commission was asked for, but which applies just as much to-day—namely, as "altogether without a parallel in any country, civilised or uncivilised"—that we ask to-day for a Royal Commission as stated in my resolution. As regards the forms or methods by which compensation might be made, there seems to be no reason why the usual practice in such cases should not be followed, and the compensation be paid in money. The only reason ever alleged against this course seems to have been that the amount would probably be very large. What does this imply? Does it not mean that the injury and injustice done have been immense? if so, is there not all the greater reason for our demand that it should be made the subject of inquiry at the hands of a competent Commission? But while we can see no reason why we should not receive compensation in the usual form of payment in money, we have indicated various other forms in which compensation or redress might be, to some extent (and even to a large extent) granted without making any payments out of the Imperial Exchequer involving expense or loss to the general taxpayer. These proposals have long ago been submitted to Her Majesty's Government, and I do not propose to deal with them at any length on the present occasion, because we rather advocate that they should now be made the subject of inquiry and report by a Royal Commission, with the object of giving effect to the resolution adopted by this House about a year ago. I may, however, very shortly state their general character. First of all, we urge that the reforms recommended by the Fry Commission should receive a fair trial, in the hope that improved methods of administering the Acts would stem the daily and ever-increasing tide of confiscation. Then we ask that the State should endeavour to lighten the burden and facilitate the redemption of land charges, both private and public, by State loans to pay off well-secured mortgages; by legislation to encourage and assist the formation of mortgage debenture institutions; by an Act to enable owners and incumbrancers to convert any existing mortgage or charge into bonds or land debentures; by granting the most favourable terms possible for the purchase of State charges (such as tithe rent-charge, Crown rents, quit rents, etc.) and for the repayment of Board of Works loans; by reforms of procedure and amendments of the law under the Land Purchase Acts, with the object of decreasing as much as possible the loss of income to the landlord in sales under those Acts, and thereby encouraging and promoting such sales; and, lastly (but by no means the least in importance), by enabling titles to be cleared and registered at the expense of the State in the first instance, the State being afterwards recouped by fees on future transactions. I would like to point out that some of these proposals might be extended to the entire United Kingdom, with great public advantage, and much benefit to the landed classes. I refer especially to the formation of land debenture institutions, and the clearing and registering of titles. I will not add any further evidence of the justice of our demand, but with your Lordships' permission I should like to deal with one or two arguments I have heard used when the question of the Irish Land Acts has been under discussion. The argument has been used, that when the Land Act of 1881 was passed it was strongly opposed by many of the leading members of the present Government, but that, it having been passed, all they can do is to accept the fact. In this argument is omitted one of the chief facts which occurred when the Act of 1881 was passed—namely, the distinct assertion of the Prime Minister of England that, if a certain thing happened, Parliament would be bound to give us compensation. Again, what I ask the Government to-day is, will they assert that Parliament is not bound in equity to redeem the pledges given to Irish landlords in the past? Parliament, I venture to assert, was never intended or created to despoil one section of the community for the benefit of another. On the contrary, we look to their endeavours to assure to the people of this Empire truth and justice for all generations. But look at the state of the land laws in Ireland to-day. The landlords are being ruined; the tenants are growing more dissatisfied every day that their reductions are not bigger; and what can be expected as a result but a growing sense of insecurity of capital—about the most evil and poisonous plant that could be grown in Ireland, which, being a poor country, wants all the capital possible. But, my Lords, the danger of this state of things being allowed to continue in Ireland is not confined to that country. If once it is finally established that in any part of Great Britain you can take property for any purpose, without compensation, where is the security for any man's property? Where, indeed, is the security for property of any kind, if Socialism is to be the watchword of a Unionist party? It is against the final fixing of this Socialistic precedent that I ask your Lordships to pass this resolution to-day. Another danger exists while this inequity exists, namely, that it is becoming daily more evident that Parliament either will not, or cannot, remedy this awful injustice in Ireland. We were assured before the last general election that no Irish Parliament was needed because the British Parliament could amend any just Irish grievance. It is true that the Government appointed the Fry Commission to make a very strictly limited inquiry into the process in operation under the Land Act of 1881, but though that body was presided over by one of the ablest English judges, and came to a unanimous decision, most of its recommendations remain to-day a dead letter, though over two years and a half have passed since their Report was issued, and though it referred very distinctly

"to the great evil wrought by that unrest which is generated by the periodical settlement of rents."

If once it is proved that an English Parliament cannot amend the just grievances of Ireland, one of the chief arguments used at the last general election goes by the board. It may be asked why, if we know that damage has been done, do not we state our claim specifically? The answer is, just as any one of your Lordships would know that damage had been done to your interests if, say, a railway was run opposite your hall-door, or through your park, still you might not be able to specify the amount of damage, or what compensation or redress you required, till you had received a professional valuer's report. The evils we complain of are not of the past. They are occurring daily, and, unless immediately stopped, wholesale ruin of Irish landowners stares them in the face. We do not ask that anything should be taken from the tenants. We do ask for equality of treatment for landlord and tenant. We say that if you undermine the security of property in land in Ireland you will prevent British capital being used there, as has already been done. We say that the Land Acts satisfy no one. They have not satisfied the tenants. Witness the Irish League started in county Mayo, which is now doing all it can to ruin the larger farmers by the same methods employed in former years to ruin the landlords by the Irish Land League. We maintain that the existing unrest on account of the Irish Land Acts will go on growing till you will have a task before you which may well appal the stoutest heart. And last, but not least, we contend that it is against public policy for such a glaring mass of injustice to be allowed to continue for another day in our midst. The Prime Minister has condemned, and rightly, the view that the operations in South Africa were undertaken not because of the grievances of the Uitlanders, but because there are gold mines there. This country has spent thousands of lives and millions of money to right their grievances. Why not, then, remedy the grievances of loyal Irishmen, instead of handing over them and their property to some of the bitterest foes this country has? Are you going to say to the loyal Irishmen who have fought in South Africa when they get back, to such of them as survive the horrors and hardships they have so nobly and willingly encountered for you, "You have fought to the death in order to right the wrongs of the Uitlanders, but do not dare to ask redress of your own wrongs. If you do you will be very ill-advised." Is this what you are going to say to them? If it is, I, for one, do not believe the English nation will back you up. My Lords, the issue is a simple one, though, as I have said, of the deepest moment to the whole Empire—are you or are you not going to establish the precedent that a Government may take away a man's property from him without compensation? If you are going to establish this as a precedent, then you are sapping the very foundations of the Empire's prosperity. You are making a fatal mistake, which can never be rectified; and why? Because you have not sufficient faith in the inherent nobility of the British people to say, "We will right the wrongs of these our fellow-citizens, even if it should cost us something to do it."

Moved to resolve, That as the claim of Irish landlords to compensation or redress from the State has been on several recent occasions placed before Parliament, and as its justice has never been seriously disputed, a Royal Commission be immediately appointed to consider and report (inter alia)—

1. As to the nature and extent of the injury which Irish landowners have suffered by legislation since 1881; and
2. As to the best means of affording compensation or redress for the injury so inflicted upon them, having regard to the assurances given in Parliament in and since 1881 by members of successive Governments, or of the Legislature, that if Irish landowners were found to have suffered loss or injury from Irish land legislation it would be the duty of Parliament to compensate them.

—(The Viscount Templetown.)

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Duke of DEVONSHIRE): My Lords, the Prime Minister has asked me, perhaps as a retribution for the part I took in passing the Act of 1881, to reply on behalf of the Government to the resolution moved by the noble Lord. In one respect, at all events, perhaps in many others, the selection is an unfortunate one; for, though any one of my colleagues would have given substantially the same answer that I shall have to give, both the Prime Minister himself and some of my colleagues could at least have given the noble Lord and his friends the satisfaction of repeating some of those criticisms and denunciations of the Act of 1881 which they have uttered on so many occasions, and which might have given some comfort to the noble Lord, whereas I, at least, am debarred from giving him even that moderate amount of satisfaction, because, while I am bound to admit that the Act of 1881 has not done all that was expected of it in improving and settling the relations between landlord and tenant in Ireland, while I admit that it may have pressed harder on Irish landlords than I, at least, ever anticipated that it would, while I am bound to admit that the absence of any definition of the principles on which fair rents ought to be fixed has left room for decisions many of which seem to be unaccountable and some of which may appear to be unjust, while I am bound to admit that the Land Act has many blots and imperfections, I am still prepared to maintain that, looking to the circumstances which at the time prevailed in Ireland, both justice and policy alike demanded some legislation in this direction, and even now I am not prepared to admit that I repent of the part I took in passing that Act. I had some difficulty in understanding what meaning was to be attached to the word "redress" which the noble Lord uses in his resolution. I rather gather from some of his concluding remarks that the word is intended to cover possible alterations which might be made in the Land Acts themselves, or in the procedure under them, such as were the subject of inquiry by the Fry Commission. That Commission was appointed two or three years ago to consider the procedure, the practice, and the methods of valuation, rent fixing, and land purchase tribunals. As I see that attention is going to be called to the Report of that Commission on Monday next, I think that it may be better that I should not attempt on this occasion to anticipate that discussion. I shall confine the observations I have to make entirely to the question of compensation. Well, my Lords, I have to state on the part of the Government that we are unable to accept this resolution, for two reasons. In the first place, the resolution asks us to accept a principle of compensation wider and more absolute in form than has ever been admitted by any Government, as far as I know, in the past, and in a form in which we certainly are not prepared to admit the principle. In the next place it asked for the appointment of a Royal Commission which would be charged with an inquiry into subjects in regard to which, in our opinion, no Commission is competent to form a judgment or to advise either the Government or Parliament. It is not possible to assert the principle of compensation in a wider, broader, or more absolute manner than is contained in this resolution. I have no desire to attribute to the Irish landlords in general the desire to make unreasonable demands, and I think that probably most of them would admit that the warning which was given to them three years ago by the Prime Minister was not an unreasonable one, when he advised them not to make a claim for compensation in the shape of money from the English Exchequer. The noble Lord who moved this resolution did not appear to entirely accept that advice, because he told us he did not see why compensation should not be given in money, which, of course, must come direct from the English Exchequer. Although the noble Lord spoke in the name of the Landlords' Convention, he has, perhaps, in that respect, not represented the opinion of the whole of the Irish landlords. An Irish landlord, writing apparently with some authority on the subject, in a pamphlet called "The Case of the Irish Landlords," says of this warning given by the Prime Minister—

> "All that his second condition can reasonably be taken to mean is a warning that admissions that the landlords have been hardly treated by, and under, the Land Acts were not to be taken as invitations to the Duke of Abercorn (for example) to draw up a statement to the effect that the value of his Irish property in 1870 was (say) £895,000, and that by 1898 it was reduced to £537,000, and to demand a cheque for £358,000 balance due, and so on to all other landlords in turn. Some Irish landlords suffer from strange delusions, and, perhaps, a warning of this kind is not misplaced."

It does not seem to have been misplaced in the case of the noble Lord who moved this resolution. The writer of the pamphlet adds—

> "The operation of the Land Acts has been so variable, capricious, and obscure that no landlord can make a statement of the amount he has lost in pounds, shillings, and pence that can hold water."

The terms of the resolution which the noble Lord has moved would cover even a demand for a certain sum in damages for injuries sustained, and if a Commission were appointed under this resolution they would have to endeavour to make an inquiry into the actual amount of loss sustained by the Irish landlords, collectively and individually. I conceive that there is no precedent in which Parliament has accepted in this broad manner the principle of compensation for loss sustained in consequence of legislation, except in cases where the consequences were foreseen, and were capable of being provided for either in the legislation itself or in simultaneous legislation. The provision for compensating the slave-owners was, I believe, contained in the Act itself, and simultaneously with the Act for the abolition of the Corn Laws Sir Robert Peel brought forward a proposal to transfer from the land to the Exchequer the burden of certain rates as compensation for the injury which it was anticipated the landed interest would suffer from that measure. There are numerous instances in which this principle might have been put forward and might have been accepted by Parliament. In the case of the Ground Game Act and the Landlord and Tenant Act certain rights and privileges were transferred from the English landlords to their tenants. Some of those rights and privileges possessed pecuniary value, but no proposal was ever made to compensate the landlords for the rights of which they were deprived. Railway shareholders might put forward a claim for compensation for the costly improvements which have been imposed upon them by Railway Regulation Acts for the protection or convenience of the public or of their own servants, and which have been imposed upon them since the dates at which their original Acts were granted. Manufacturers and owners of mines might make a similar claim in respect of the restrictions on hours of labour and the expensive precautions which they are now compelled by law to make in the interest of the health and safety of their workmen, and which in many cases have largely reduced their profits. No one has ever suggested a claim for compensation in these cases. Employers generally might raise a claim for compensation in respect of the loss which they have incurred through the Compensation to Workmen Act, but no one has suggested that the Exchequer should be made liable for the insurance that the employers may be compelled to make in order to protect themselves against that liability. It is quite clear that claims of this character might be raised in future if Parliament, in its wisdom, should ever think fit to make any alteration in the law relating to licenses and the sale of intoxicating liquors in such a manner as might have the effect of reducing the profits of that great trade. These instances might be indefinitely multiplied, but I have mentioned enough to show that the principle which we are asked in this resolution to sanction is one of a very far-reaching and very dangerous character. Some reference has been made to pledges which are said to have been given by Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues in 1881. Nothing has been brought forward by the noble Lord, and I have found nothing in the statements which have been put forward on behalf of the Irish Landowners' Convention, which is more definite than the statement of Mr. Gladstone, which the noble Lord has quoted, that if loss could be proved as a direct consequence of the Act, that would be a question which Parliament would be bound to look very directly in the face. But it is easy to find other passages, which it has not been found desirable to quote, in which Mr. Gladstone dealt directly with the question of compensation, and in which, while he admitted that compensation would be due if confiscation could be proved to be contained in the Act, he always denied that the principle of confiscation was to be found in the Act, and, therefore, he refused to include any principle of compensation in the Act. I submit that Parliament cannot be bound, and ought not in the interest of the taxpayers of this country to hold themselves bound, by anything which may have been said in the course of a debate of a vague character, such as these declarations, upon matters which might have been made the subject of definite enactment, or, at all events, might have taken the shape of a definite proposal made to Parliament. I do not recollect whether the question of compensation was ever directly raised by way of Amendment during the debates on the Act of 1881, but for this purpose it does not much matter whether it was or not. If it was not so raised it must have been because the Irish landowners and their friends did not see in what way a reasonable proposal on the subject which Parliament would be likely to accept could be made; and if it was raised by Amendment that Amendment certainly must have been rejected by Parliament, and by the only Parliament which had the whole case before it and was entitled to enact that a price should be paid by the British taxpayer for this legislation. The noble Lord first proposes that a Commission should examine into the extent of the injury suffered by Irish landowners in consequence of the legislation of 1881. Well, my Lords, it is admitted by some of these landlords, at all events, that it would be impossible for them to make a statement of the loss they had incurred through that Act that would hold water, and there are elements on the other side which would have to be taken into account and which it would be impossible to calculate. It seems to be assumed that, but for the Land Act, there would have been no loss to the landlords; but since 1881 rents have been reduced in England no less than they have been reduced in Ireland. I know that it is said that the agricultural conditions of England and Ireland differ very widely, and that the economical causes which have led to the reduction of rents in England have not affected Ireland in the same way. It was not held that so great a difference existed between the agricultural conditions of England and Ireland as to cause Ireland to be excluded from the compensation which was given in 1846 by Sir Robert Peel to the agricultural interest, for one of his proposals was that, concurrently with the repeal of the Corn Laws, the whole, instead of half, of the cost of the constabulary should be paid out of the Exchequer, the express object being to give to Irish landlords some compensation for the loss that it was contemplated would fall upon them in consequence of the repeal of the Corn Laws. It is not possible to contend that the economical causes which have led to reductions of rent in England have not had a similar effect in Ireland. I am unwilling to trouble your Lordships with my own experiences, but it certainly confirms the opinion I hold, that in any circumstances there must have been a considerable reduction in rents in Ireland. I have, as many of your Lordships know, a large estate in Ireland, and, as your Lordships probably do not know, I am the owner of a small estate in Somersetshire. Somersetshire is not one of the counties in England chiefly affected by low prices, for it is not a wheat growing county; but comparing the three years from 1878 to 1880 and 1895 to 1897, I find that, while the reduction in rent on one of the Irish estates has been 16 per cent. the reduction on the English estate has been 35 per cent. I admit there may be peculiar circumstances in that, and that that may not be universally the case, but still it cannot possibly be denied that in estimating the loss which has been incurred by Irish landlords the economical causes which brought about the reduction of rents in England must be taken into consideration. That is one element in the estimate which it is almost impossible to calculate. There is another still more difficult to calculate, and that is, what would Irish rents have been worth in 1881, since 1881, and now, but for the Irish land legislation? Noble Lords have a very lively recollection of the Land Act of 1881, but they seem to have forgotten the agitation which preceded it. They have forgotten the resistance, which had already come into existence, against the payment of any rent at all, and they have forgotten the temper in which this resistance to the payment of rent was received in this country. It is easy enough now to say it was a wicked and unscrupulous agitation, raised wholly for political purposes, and without any just cause, and that it was the duty of the then Government to have enforced the law and the rights of the landlords; but no Government could do more than what Parliament, and the people to whom Parliament is responsible, give it the means of doing, and, looking back at the circumstances of those times and the temper which prevailed in Parliament and in the country, I hold it would have been absolutely impossible for the then Government or for any Government to have enforced the rights of the Irish landlords under penalty of eviction under an unreformed land law. Then there are elements in this estimate which the noble Lord would direct the Commission to make, which are impossible of calculation. The noble Lord has made some alteration in the terms of his resolution since he first placed it on the Paper. He has very wisely eliminated the second of his proposed instructions directing the Commission to inquire into the pledge which had been given by various statesmen on the subject. I think he can hardly have seriously contemplated that a Royal Commission should be appointed to inquire into what authority ought to be attached to the speeches of either the promoters or opponents of that measure upon matters which might have found expression, not in speeches alone, but in definite legislative proposals. The last instruction the noble Lord would give to the Commission relates to the best means of giving compensation. Although, for reasons which I have endeavoured to state, I conceive that anything in the nature of direct compensation is an impossibility, and although I think that the Irish landlords prejudice their case by putting forward a demand which may be capable of being understood in that sense, yet I am perfectly willing to admit that the case of the Irish landlords is a hard one. There can be no doubt, from the speeches of Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues, that he and they did not anticipate that the Land Act would prove to be an injury to the landlords, they rather anticipated that it would prove a benefit; but it cannot be maintained that that anticipation has been realised. Neither can it be asserted, I think, that if the Act has led to greater reductions of rent than were anticipated, if it has deprived the landlords of a larger proportion of the rights of property than the framers of the Act intended, through the decisions of the courts, these consequences have been owing in any degree to the fact that investigation has proved that the Irish landlords were a more exacting or a more rapacious body, as a whole, than they have been supposed to be. It cannot be denied that the Act has pressed more hardly upon them than was either desired or anticipated. But, when I make this admission, I cannot do more than again repeat the advice which was given to the Irish landlords by the Prime Minister three years ago, when he advised them to bring forward such proposals for the alleviation of their position as they soberly thought could reasonably be adopted, and as by the moderation of their desires and arguments, as well as by the strength of the reasons they put forward, would be commended to the impartial and sympathetic acceptance of English statesmen. It is in this direction, and in this direction only, that any alleviation of the hardships of the Irish landlords can be found. We have endeavoured to do something in this direction. We have endeavoured to facilitate, in the interest of landlords as well as of tenants, the progress of land purchase. Up to March, 1897, advances from the Treasury for this purpose had been made at the rate of about £500,000 a year. In the next year they amounted to £800,000, and in the two last completed years they have amounted to £1,800,000 in each year, and I am informed the demand is somewhat on the increase. We have not waited for the Irish landlords themselves to make proposals. In connection with the Local Government Act, passed two years ago, the Government itself proposed and carried a provision which relieved them of half the poor rate, involving an expense of £316,000 a year. There is a measure now before Parliament — the Tithe Rent-charge Bill—which Irish landlords have frequently asked for, and which will give them some further relief of the same character. I do not say that these measures have given, or are capable of giving, the full measure of compensation to which they may think themselves entitled, but I do say that these measures show on the part of the Government a sympathetic spirit towards a class and an interest which we believe to be in an unfortunate and difficult position. And I say, further, that it is only through measures such as these, through measures which can be recommended and supported on grounds of public policy, and not only as instalments of compensation, that any further relief of the landlord's position can be found. I further say that some such measures of relief as those which have been enumerated by the noble Lord may be found in subsequent years to be worthy of consideration, but such measures can only be proposed or accepted by the Government on its own responsibility to Parliament, and I cannot conceive how the adoption of such measures would be facilitated by the appointment of a Commission charged with duties so difficult, if not impossible, as those suggested by the noble lord. For these reasons the Government have to resist the resolution. One word I must say in conclusion. The noble Lord asserted in his speech, and asserts in his resolution also, that the justice of these claims has never been denied.

THE EARL OF MAYO: Never been seriously disputed.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: Never been seriously disputed. Well, as the noble Lord reminded us, a similar claim was put forward in a resolution which was moved by Lord Inchiquin last year. It is quite true that that resolution was carried by a small majority in a not very large House, but it was opposed by every one of Her Majesty's present and late advisers who sit in this House. I do not know how, under such circumstances, the noble Lord can ask us to assert that the justice of these claims has never been seriously disputed. For the reasons I have given, the Government feel compelled to resist the resolution.

*LORD CLONBROCK: My Lords, I deeply regret to hear the answer which the noble Duke has given on behalf of the Government. Our chief reason for asking for a Royal Commission is that though we have repeatedly brought forward the case of the Irish landlords, and stated in, I fear, often wearisome detail our several grounds of complaint and the nature and extent of our injuries, we have never been able to obtain any exhaustive examination of these points. The impression, therefore, is naturally left on the minds of many Members of this House and the public that we have overstated our case, and that, although we may have something to complain of, we are not worthy of much consideration. We have only been able to get from Her Majesty's Government an acknowledgment that our case is a hard one, and an assurance that we have their sympathy. The impression to which I have referred will no doubt be strengthened by the comparison which I was surprised to hear made by the noble Duke between the reductions of rent in Ireland and in England. That comparison is a plausible one, but I think we can show that it is unsound, especially in the case of the reductions of second-term rents which are now being made to an alarming extent in Ireland. In England rent is fixed by what a solvent farmer who knows his business chooses to give, and therefore depends on the prices of agricultural produce and the cost of production.

In Ireland the element of competition is entirely excluded, while the high price paid for tenant right shows that tenants would be ready to pay a higher rent than the judicial one. How rents in Ireland are fixed it is impossible to exactly ascertain, for no definition of what constitutes a fair rent has ever been furnished to the men who have been appointed to fix that rent. We know that what the Fry Commission called popular evidence, namely, the rent paid for land in the vicinity, long and punctual payment of a real rent, and so forth, is not admitted, and we therefore must assume that if the rent depends upon anything more than caprice it is upon what is called technical evidence, namely, the opinions of experts as to the capabilities of a farm, prices of agricultural produce, and cost of production. The question of improvements may be entirely eliminated, because an allowance was made for improvements on the first occasion when the rents were fixed. The cost of production is held by the Fry Report to be about the same, as, although labour is higher, the price of agricultural requisites, seeds, manures, etc., has decreased; and therefore these sweeping reductions which are taking place in second-term rents must depend on the fall in agricultural produce. I have in my hand a Report prepared by probably the greatest living authority in Ireland, Mr. Barnes, in which he calculates that the fall in the average gross profits of agricultural produce, stock and crops combined, for the whole of Ireland, since the first five years from 1881 to 1885, compared with the years from 1895 to the present year, is under 5 per cent.—$4\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. is the exact figure. But the rents have been reduced in the last period on an average of $24\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. The Fry Commission laid it down that if there was a reduction of values of 20 per cent., the reduction in rent ought to be $33\frac{1}{3}$ per cent. If we take that standard, the reduction of rents to which I have referred, instead of being $24\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., ought to have been under 8 per cent. Therefore rents have been reduced, according to this table, treble as much as they ought to have been. I think that disposes of the comparison between English and Irish rents. But there is another serious grievance which Irish landlords have which was hardly mentioned by the noble Duke, and which has no parallel in England. By the Act of 1881, supplemented by the Act of 1896, the selling value of Irish property has been reduced from about twenty-three years purchase of the old rent to about seventeen years purchase of the reduced rents. That has nothing to do with the reductions of rent or the fall in agricultural produce. There is no reason why the number of years purchase should have been varied. It means that a sum of over 25 per cent. of the fee simple value of the property has been taken from the landlord and transferred to the sitting tenant. It is on such losses as these that we base our claim for compensation. We do not ask for direct money compensation. We have taken the warning addressed to us by the noble Marquess the Prime Minister. But we ask for some measure of relief. The noble Duke stated that there was no precedent for granting compensation unless it had been taken into account at the time the legislation was passed which rendered the claim for compensation eventually necessary. Well, I would ask whether there was any precedent for the Act of 1881, but in any case it seems hard that, because the framers of that Act were deficient in foresight, and could not see what the consequences of the measure would be, the people who have suffered from its operations should continue to suffer. We wish to have the various schemes for relief to landlords which were mentioned by my noble friend who moved this motion, especially as some of them are of a highly technical character, referred to a Royal Commission for examination, and we are deeply disappointed at finding this Commission refused by Her Majesty's Government. I wish the House would consider the position of landlords in Ireland at the present time. By landlords I do not necessarily mean large landlords or wealthy men. There are many small and struggling landlords who are now being reduced to penury by these excessive reductions of rent, which are not justified by economic causes. There is a great probability that in another fifteen years there will be still further reductions. We hold that a grievous wrong has been done to us, unintentionally we freely admit, by Parliament and by the people of the United Kingdom, who approved of the legislation which has been passed, and it is to the sense of justice of the English people that we appeal. We appeal also to Her Majesty's Government. As I have before said in this House, if we lived in a foreign country our position might be a very different one, for if any of Her Majesty's subjects abroad were injured by any foreign State the noble Marquess at the head of the Government would not be slow in demanding redress. He would stand forward as their defender, knowing well that in any steps he took he would be secure in the confidence of his countrymen, who are convinced, from the long record of his public service, that the national honour is safe in his hands. I would ask the noble Marquess and Her Majesty's Government whether the national honour may not be equally concerned in dealing with Her Majesty's subjects at home? We claim the protection of the Government. We claim it as loyal subjects, loyal not only to Her Majesty the Queen but loyal to the connection with England, to the Constitution, the laws, and the traditions of England. I do not claim for Irish landlords a monopoly of loyalty, but I do say that among that class there are more loyal men than are to be found in any other class in Ireland, and we have suffered for our loyalty. It is sometimes cast in our teeth that under other circumstances we should have received at least as much consideration from our opponents as we have from those whom we supported, and that if we had thrown in our lot with the rest of our countrymen we should be in a better position. I do not accept this view. I doubt that any identity of political views would outweigh the unpardonable sin of holding property which is coveted by others. I only mention it to show the opinion of our opponents as to how we are treated. An article appeared not long ago in The Times, signed by a well-known writer, in which was described a conversation the writer had had with a friend in Cape Town some ten years ago, in which his friend, after making a sufficiently gloomy forecast of what would happen in South Africa, used words which are thoroughly applicable to the state of things in Ireland. "Remember," he said, "that as it was in 1881, the Government will take care that it does not pay anyone to be loyal." I sincerely hope that policy will not be pursued in South Africa, but it is in that spirit that Ireland has been governed. This is the feeling, not among landlords alone, but among loyal men of other classes in many parts of Ireland. And well may it be so, when they see the property of loyal men gradually taken away for the benefit of their opponents, when they see that by another Legislative Act those men have been deprived of all voice in the management and administration of affairs in their country, when they see that in the case of a Government appointment one is selected not from among those who have been consistent in support of law and order, but from those whose conduct has been widely different, when any representations which they make to Government produce little or no effect. But if loyalty does not pay in Ireland disaffection does. It is this discouragement which is given to loyalists that encourages and fosters disaffection and agitation. As to the dangerous agitation now prevailing in Ireland, which, as the noble Duke said of the former Land League, is political in its origin, the people are taught by their leaders that as the land agitation previously brought about the Act of 1881, and has given them control over a portion of the landed property of Ireland, so they may by the present agitation endeavour to obtain control over the remainder. I am convinced that Her Majesty's Government are as much opposed to this agitation as I am. I have never failed to express that opinion. But can it be wondered at that it is strengthened and consolidated when its leaders see a candidate appointed to an important Government situation who some years ago was a leader and organiser of an equally immoral conspiracy? The Government may have satisfied themselves that the gentleman in question has modified the extremely lax principles of morality which admitted of this attitude, but no announcement has been made to that effect. It is not surprising that when the leaders of public opinion in Ireland see that resistance to the law and antagonism to England are a sure passport to favour, they should do their utmost to maintain that attitude among the people. The people would be well enough if they were let alone. Everyone who lives among them will gladly recognise their many good and generous qualities. But they are an impulsive and a credulous race, easily led away by sophistical reasoning and held in thraldom by their leaders. On the occasion of the Royal visit, when the instinctive chivalry and good feeling of the people led them to break away from their leaders, and tender to Her Majesty a welcome which no one who witnessed it is likely to forget, these leaders hastened to discount the enthusiasm which they had in vain endeavoured to repress and to assure the world that, though this welcome was extended to the Queen, the feeling of hostility towards England was as bitter and as determined as ever. They feared that they might lose the hold which they deemed their disloyal attitude had given them over the timidity of England. I deeply regret the position the noble Duke has taken up with regard to the motion now before the House, and I cannot help thinking that the Government are unaware of the discouragement which they are giving to all loyal classes in Ireland, who feel deeply that, because they have no political power they have been abandoned by England, in whom they thought they could place reliance.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: My Lords, I also deeply regret the reply of the noble Duke; but as his reply is in the negative, I will not occupy your Lordships' time by any arguments which I might have adduced in favour of the motion. I believe the noble Duke, in the course of his speech, referred to myself, but I was not able exactly to catch the purport of his remarks.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: I only read an extract in which your name occurred.

THE DUKE OF ABERCORN: I beg to assure your Lordships that I support the motion because I take an interest in the affairs of the landowners in Ireland, and that I am not in the slightest degree influenced by my own position. I only endeavour to serve others and to urge their grounds of grievance as far as possible. The answer which the noble Duke has given will be received in Ireland with bitterness and regret. I use the word "bitterness," because the landowners in that country will see that even their last effort to obtain redress has been opposed by the Government. I do wish the Government had a little more pluck, and that they would really take in hand the grievances of this particular section of Her Majesty's subjects, without looking too closely to the future and to the results of their action. I firmly believe that a little pluck in this regard would produce the best results, and would be the means of bringing round their standard many of those who at the present time are wavering. It is not those who have large incomes who suffer so severely; it is those unfortunate gentlemen who have small incomes, and whose property is gradually being taken away from them. Year by year the Commission goes on, and each year more or less of the property of these unfortunate men is abstracted from them, so that in the course of a few years it is impossible to say what their position may be. I really fear that these men will cease to exist as a class—men whose ancestors fought for the Empire, as their sons are doing to-day—and that eight-tenths of the houses will be shut up in Ireland—houses which have produced such sterling yeomen and such sterling defenders of our country. I regret extremely the decision of Her Majesty's Government, but as long as we have life and breath we shall continue to do our best to urge the claims of these unfortunate landowners whatever Government may be in power.

*THE EARL OF MAYO: My Lords, I was glad to hear that the noble Duke the Lord President of the Council admitted that the Act of 1881 had not done all that was expected at the time. It has, however, done a great deal more than we, as Irish landowners, expected, and we have suffered most severely at its hands. The noble Duke said the Commission could not possibly deal with many of the matters mentioned in the motion. The same sort of thing was said with regard to the Commission we asked for to inquire into the Land Acts. But if the recommendations of the Fry Commission were adopted by the Government they would go a long way to help the Irish landlords, and to remove their grievances. But what has happened? Scarcely anything has been done to carry out those recommendations. The noble Duke made a comparison between his property in Ireland and in Somersetshire. He said there were very large reductions in England, larger, I gathered, than in Ireland, but we must remember that in his Irish property there is a most valuable salmon fishery.

THE DUKE OF DEVONSHIRE: That has nothing to do with it.

*THE EARL OF MAYO: I admit that it was not included, but it is a most valuable asset in the property. There was one point which the noble Duke emphacised very much—namely, that we were not to expect compensation in pounds, shillings, and pence from the Exchequer. The noble Viscount did not say that we did expect compensation in this form. What he said was that, while we could see no reason why we should not receive compensation in actual payment of money, there were many other forms in which we could receive it. I do not suppose for one instant that anyone in his senses would imagine that we could ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to pour golden sovereigns into our pockets because we have suffered in consequence of the Land Acts. Tenants in Ireland are lent money at $2\frac{3}{4}$ per cent., repayable by instalments spread over a long period, and in cases where Irish landlords have suffered from State interference with their rents, I think they might fairly claim the benefit of such loans. But this and other alternative methods of compensation are set forth in the recommendation of the Landlords' Convention of 1889, and are well known to the House. The comparisons of the noble Duke were not appropriate. He put forward as an argument that railway shareholders might be compared to Irish landlords, but I cannot see how that can be. Railway shareholders, no doubt, have to suffer loss when large improvements have to be made for the accommodation and safety of passengers, but if they have to provide large sums for such improvements what results — increasing traffics and increased revenue. Then the noble Duke mentioned, as another point in his argument, the Workmen's Compensation Act. Against claims upon them under that Act employers can insure; but how can an Irish landlord insure against the inroads the Land Commission make, every fifteen years, upon his income? If we could have insured against them we would have done so long ago. With regard to the question of rents having also been reduced in England, it must be remembered that tenant right, which exists in Ireland, does not exist in England. English landlords have not got that awful thing to face which is called tenant right, and which practically means this, that the landlord cannot regain possession of his property. I will tell you how a landlord can regain possession of his property in Ireland. If a tenant does not pay his rent he can evict him, but what happens? The tenant puts up the tenant right to auction, and in order that the landlord can get back his property he has to buy it at the highest price that is bid at that auction. How would English landlords like to face that state of things? I ask your Lordships what is the use of talking of what happened when Sir Robert Peel passed measures in 1841 dealing with the Constabulary in Ireland? We have long passed that stage. The Corn Laws have been repealed, and, thank goodness, we have got a Constabulary. We have heard a great deal about the good that the Acts framed for the purpose of purchase have done in Ireland, but these Acts are framed and administered as if the interest of the tenant need be the only thing to be considered and consulted. The condition of purchase is made as tempting as possible to the tenant, and all proposals that have been made for mitigating the loss of income and the heavy cost entailed upon landlords who under these Acts have sold their property, have been dealt with both by the Government and the Land Commission in a grudging spirit. Mortgage debenture institutions, which have done so much good in Central Prussia, Eastern Prussia, and other parts of Germany, would be of the greatest use in Ireland. They do not entail any call upon the Exchequer, and the working of them amounts to this: a large number of proprietors unite in raising money upon their joint credit, which they lend to each other in such sums as they consider safe. I regret very much that Her Majesty Government have taken up this attitude with regard to the Royal Commission asked for by the noble Viscount. After all, we only ask that the matter should be inquired into. Of course, if the Commission find that we have got no losses, then we have no case; but we are so certain that we have a good case that we ask for this Royal Commission. A vast transfer of property has taken place in Ireland by the behest of Parliament, but Ireland as a whole is none the richer, the property having passed from one class to another, while the Imperial Exchequer stands by risking not a single sixpence in the transaction. I hope the noble Viscount will press his motion to a division.

*THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): My Lords, I would like in a very few words to remind your Lordships of the question upon which you are asked to express an opinion. The topics that have been presented to-night so fairly and so forcibly by my noble friends have not been presented for the first time. On several occasions the same arguments have been addressed clearly and persuasively to your Lordships, but we are always bound to consider how far any proposals which are put forward are possible and practicable. Your Lordships are asked, as you were last year, to affirm that compensation should be given to the landowners. I have to remind your Lordships of what the noble Duke (the Duke of Devonshire) has already pointed out—namely, that it is impossible to suggest that the justice of these claims has been admitted when every Member of the Government felt constrained last year, as on previous occasions, to vote against the suggestion then made that compensation was practicable and should be given. Analogies have been cited by my noble friend Lord Templetown in which compensation has been given, but on every single occasion that he mentioned the topic of compensation was dealt with at the time of the Act, and no one ever suggested that it was possible to go back after a number of years and give compensation in respect of the working of an Act of Parliament. I was an opponent of the Act of 1881, and I have never said a word in favour of its policy or operation. But we have to take it as an Act of Parliament on the Statute Book and deal with it as part of the law of the land. What is suggested is that in some way or other compensation is to be given for the way in which rents have been reduced under the working of the Act of 1881. Is that possible? Can every case under the Act be re-tried? Has it not to be borne in mind that thousands of cases have been settled by agreement between landlord and tenant? In thousands of cases there were no appeals. In thousands of others there were appeals, and the reduction of rent was affirmed. Would it be possible to disentangle the reductions and say, "This much was worked out by economic causes and this much by the operation and undue working of an unfair and unreasonable Act of Parliament"? It is admitted that compensation in money is practically impossible. It is admitted to be impossible also to take away from the tenants one single benefit they have received. Then what compensation is suggested? It is suggested that some method should be found of getting some form of indirect compensation elsewhere by other Acts of Parliament—methods that it is very hard to realise or understand. At the present moment there is the Tithes Bill, which has been asked for not as compensation, but as a mere tardy measure of justice, passing through the other House of Parliament. The Fry Commission has been mentioned. We shall have the pleasure of having that Commission's Report discussed on Monday, when I will be prepared to give my noble friend who introduced the question every possible information as to the method in which the recommendations of that Commission are being dealt with. Land purchase, which is the most hopeful solution of the Irish land question, is going on vigorously, and Section 40 of the Act of 1896 is working in a reasonable and satisfactory manner. I see my noble friend (Lord Templemore) smiling, but I claim that I know the purchase question, and am as well able as any of my noble friends to understand its bearings. With regard to loans to landowners to pay off their first charges, which were mentioned by the noble Earl behind me (the Earl of Mayo), if a method can be found by which loans on safe and easy terms can be granted, I shall be delighted, but I am strongly of opinion that its discovery would not be an asset solely in the possession of Irish landlords, but the Treasury would be asked to grant similar loans to other sections of the community. Now, what is the good of a Royal Commission? What benefit is suggested to come from voting for a Royal Commission in the circumstances I have named? Have we not had Royal Commissions and Committees enough in Ireland? There was the Richmond Commission and the Bessborough Commission before the Land Act of 1881; and after its passing there was the Committee of your Lordships' House, in which Lord Cairns took part, and in the time of the late Government the Morley Committee was appointed. We have had the Fry Commission, and what is the good of now appointing another Commission? I venture to say that the suggestion that a Commission should be appointed is impracticable. I gather from the closing words of the speech of my noble friend the Earl of Mayo that your Lordships are asked to divide on this motion. That is not a matter on which I have a right to advise, but I should have thought that the question had been adequately dealt with by the discussion which has taken place. I hope the noble Viscount will not press his motion, but if he does I shall feel it my duty to vote against it.

On Question, their Lordships divided:—Contents, 62; Not-Contents, 59.

CREMATION BILL [H.L.].

Order of the Day read for receiving Report of Amendments.

LORD MONKSWELL: In moving the reception of this Report, I should wish to give the noble Lord who represents the Home Office an opportunity of saying a word as to what the Home Office has done with regard to the suggestions made in the Standing Committee upon Clause 8.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): With regard to Clause 8, I should like to draw my noble friend's attention to this point. All provisions now existing in private Acts with regard to crematoria which are of a like purpose to those which are in this Bill will be overruled. On the whole, I think that that is perfectly right, especially with regard to bye-laws and matters of that kind. But in Clause 3 the powers of a burial authority to provide and maintain burial grounds is made to include the provision of crematoria. Now, I presume that the result of that would be, that any burial authority will have power to raise money for the provision of such crematoria under the Public Health Act; but it may be that the existing authorities have power to raise money for the same purpose—that is a "like" purpose—under their private Acts in another way. Now it is possible that these crematoria may be in process of erection at the present time. The money which the authority would naturally obtain under the provisions of their private Act would be partly raised for the purpose of their crematoria. I think it is rather doubtful, as soon as this Act passes, if those powers would remain valid at all, and if the authority would not have to come under the Public Health Act to raise what they required. That would obviously be inconvenient. I suggested to my noble friend that he should ask the Local Government Board whether there is anything in my point; I am not quite certain that there is; but I think it is one that ought to be carefully considered; and if there is anything in it possibly he may be able to suggest an Amendment, or I should be very happy to co-operate with him in amending the clause.

LORD BELPER: With regard to the question asked by the noble Lord opposite (Lord Monkswell) I can assure him that the Home Office have very carefully considered the suggestions made in the Standing Committee with regard to alterations in Clause 8. The first suggestion made was that the private and local Acts which it is proposed to repeal should be placed in a schedule, and the second suggestion was with regard to the word "like." The Home Office have carefully considered both these points, and are not able to accept them, for these reasons, which I think will commend themselves to the House. It is quite unprecedented in any Bill of this sort—a public Bill—in repealing local Acts to schedule those Acts, and indeed, on consideration, it would be seen that it was a very inconvenient and dangerous course, because, although it may be perfectly possible to know what the particular local Acts are which have passed lately, it may be dangerous to schedule the Acts because of the possibility of leaving out very small local Acts which may contain these powers without it being known; and it is thought that it is not desirable to attempt to schedule any local Acts when some might be omitted. With regard to the other point, it was objected that the word "like" was a somewhat indefinite word. I am, however, assured that the phraseology which has been adopted in this clause is precisely the phraseology of another Act, the Infectious Diseases Notification Act, and that in that case no inconvenience has been found. As a matter of fact the word "same," which was the word that would seem to be the natural one to be adopted, would not be convenient. This Bill is a general Bill for the purpose of making general regulations referring to all crematoria. In each of the local Acts they have only got their special powers with regard to the crematoria under their own jurisdiction. Therefore the word "like" is thought to be more convenient than the word "same." With regard to the point raised by the noble Earl the Chairman of Committees, I will certainly take care that it is inquired into in some way. Of course I am not responsible for the Local Government Board, but the matter shall be brought before them. I may point out, however, that this Act does not come into force until the 1st day of April next, which would leave nine clear months after the Bill became an Act, and probably any financial arrangements which were in course of procedure could be completed within that time; and even if thas was not the case it would probably be no very great inconvenience, if the matter had to be put off longer, that the remaining sum had to be raised under the general Act rather than under the local Act.

LORD MONKSWELL: I do not know how long the noble Lord thinks it will take to obtain the opinion of the Local Government Board on this matter. The session is now getting very much advanced; I am told that there is a possibility of this Bill passing this year if it leaves this House at once. I do not know whether there is any objection to taking the Third Reading on Monday.

LORD BELPER: With regard to what the noble Lord said as to the chance of the Bill passing this session, I was asked by the Secretary of State to say that, although the Home Office had moved a great many Amendments in this Bill, which they thought necessary in case the Bill passed at all, they do not wish it to be understood that they necessarily will take any responsibility with regard to the future procedure on the Bill.

Bill to be read 3ª on Monday next.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT (1897) EXTENSION BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1:—

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I mentioned to the noble Viscount, when this Bill was last before us, two points on Subsection (2) of this clause. One was as to whether the expression "contractors" would apply to labourers who were employed themselves directly on piecework. The other point was as to the word "habitually." The noble Viscount was kind enough to say that he would look into the matter and say whether he was quite satisfied that the words carried out the intention of the Bill.

THE LORD PRIVY SEAL (Viscount CROSS): Your Lordships are fortunate enough to have here the noble Lord who was Attorney General at the time this Bill was passing through the other House, and he will no doubt explain exactly the grounds on which these words can be justified.

Lord Monkswell.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My point was merely this. The word "habitually" is no doubt a very general word, and I merely expressed a fear, which I have no doubt the noble Lord will be able to dispel, that that word may lead to inconvenience and litigation.

LORD ALVERSTONE: I think I can explain the matter in a few sentences. I will first say what it was that we tried to aim at. Where a man tilled his own land, and as a rule never employed labour — perhaps his son worked with him—we considered that he should not come within the Act just because he happened to have a few labourers at harvest time. The word "perpetually" was suggested, and also the word "continually," but it was pointed out that employment of labour for six or seven consecutive days might bring a man within either of those words. Finally, it was determined to adopt the word "habitually" as one which has a distinct popular meaning. I ventured in the other House to give three illustrations, which I venture to think will commend themselves to your Lordships as they did to that House. The law does know something about the word "habitually." We have the "habitual drunkard"; that means a man who is not always drunk, but whose habit is to drink. We have the "habitual criminal"; that means a man who is not always committing crime, but whose habit is to commit crime. Thirdly, in another place I pointed out that we had (your Lordships would not say that we have here) the "habitual bore"; that is, a man who is not always a bore, but whose habit is to bore. It occurred to us that the word which most nearly expresses ordinary employment in a popular way would be the word "habitually." The matter was discussed for a considerable time, and nobody was able to suggest a better word. I think it is a good thing to have a popular word in an Act of Parliament of this kind, so that it may be construed in a popular sense; and the words, "any employer who habitually employs one or more workmen" will indicate the class of persons intended to be brought within the scope of the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am much obliged to the noble Lord for his explanation. No doubt he is a very competent judge as to whether this word would be likely to give rise to any difficulty in the courts. But I confess I should have thought that it was a word which, for the very reason that it was popular and vague, would be likely to lead to a good deal of dispute. However, I will not pursue the matter.

*LORD HERRIES: I should like to ask the noble Lord in charge of the Bill this question. It very often happens in agricultural districts that a man—perhaps a small holder of land—undertakes to plough or hoe land at so much an acre, with his own horses. In Sub section (2) there is this proviso—

"Provided that where the contractor provides and uses machinery for the purpose of threshing, ploughing, or other agricultural work, he and he alone shall be liable."

Would horses be held to come within those words? Suppose a man who contracts for this work takes a young horse of his own, and that young horse kicks him or his labourer, it would be rather hard that the employer should be liable to pay compensation.

LORD HENEAGE: I may mention another point of the same sort. It is a very common mode of procedure—in Lincolnshire, at any rate—for landlords' agents to let the loading of wood to a contractor. Who will be responsible for any injury which may take place in the loading of timber if it is done by contract and the carts belong to the contractor; will it come under the second sub-section or under the first?

LORD ALVERSTONE: I do not think there is any doubt that this Act will be read as one Act with the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1897. Therefore, the proviso in Section 4 of the latter Act will apply, and the position will be that there will be the remedy against the employer who has sub-contracted the work, and there will be the remedy over against the contractor by the employer if the circumstances are such that the law would give him a remedy. When once you include forestry (which, I presume, would cover the operations the noble Lord opposite has referred to), there is no distinction between the contractor employed for that kind of work and the sub-contractor acting under the original Act. With regard to the question of ploughing land and work of that kind, the real question will be: Is there a sub-contract for agricultural work? If so, it would come within the provisions of the Bill, and the workman would have his remedy against the employer, with the remedy over to which I have referred.

LORD HENEAGE: I am afraid I have not made my point clear. At line 15 there is this proviso—

"Provided that where the contractor provides and uses machinery for the purpose of threshing, ploughing, or other agricultural work, he, and he alone, shall be liable under this Act to pay compensation to any workman employed by him on such work."

Then, by Sub-section (3)—

"The expression 'agriculture' includes horticulture, forestry," and so on. Therefore, according to the Bill, as I read it, anything done with regard to woods would come under the proviso, and not under the original Act.

VISCOUNT CROSS: With regard to the question put by Lord Herries, I have an Amendment to propose to Clause 1—on page 1, in line 15, after the word "machinery," to insert "driven by mechanical power." That, I think, will meet the point.

LORD HERRIES: That would not meet the point I raised. I think "horses" should be introduced, as well as "machinery." It is possible that a contractor may make use of his own horse, and if he happened to make use of a bad-tempered horse, who kicked and injured him, the undertaker ought not to be liable.

LORD ALVERSTONE: In the special case that is put of threshing, ploughing, or other agricultural work, there is an express proviso that in that case the only person to be liable will be the person who contracts. I thought the noble Lord was asking about the general provisions of the Bill. In the special case he refers to it is quite clear that the sub-contractor only is intended to be liable.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I think what my noble friend is in doubt about is, whether that would apply to the case of horses. The words are—

"Where the contractor provides and uses machinery for the purpose of threshing or ploughing or other agricultural work."

Now, if he uses a timber-gill, which is a cart of a particular kind for carrying timber, if the horse that he happened to employ were, as my noble friend put it, vicious, and kicked a labourer, would the contractor be liable under the clause, and not the employer in the first instance?

VISCOUNT CROSS: That is why I ventured to call attention to the Amendment that is to be moved later on. When these words are in—"driven by mechanical power"—then the liability of the sub-contractor will be confined exclusively to that case. Where it is the ordinary employment of horses and mechanical power is not used, the general provisions will apply. This proviso is only to deal with one particular case. The main point intended to be met was the question of threshing machines, which, as the noble Lord knows, employ power other than horses for the purpose of being driven.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The noble Viscount did not answer my question as to the contractor. I asked him whether he was quite satisfied that "contractor" would include an individual doing work by piecework.

VISCOUNT CROSS: That question has been very carefully considered by the legal advisers of the Department, and they are perfectly satisfied with the words as they stand.

Amendment moved—

"In page 1, line 15, after the word 'machinery,' to insert the words 'driven by mechanical power.'"—(Viscount Cross.)

Amendment agreed to.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I am rather puzzled by these words in Sub-section (3)—

"Where any workman is employed by the same employer, mainly in agricultural but partly or occasionally in other work, this Act shall apply also to the employment of the workman in such other work."

I think I am right in saying that "domestic servant" has never yet been included under the main Act; and it would seem in this case that if a workman was also employed as a domestic servant the employer would become liable for accidents occurring to the man in the performance of his duty as a domestic servant. That would be a very large extension of the original Act.

The Earl of Kimberley.

LORD ALVERSTONE: I am not at all surprised that the phraseology of this sub-section has raised the doubt expressed by the noble Earl. The governing words are—"Employed by the same employer mainly in agricultural . . . . work."

You have first to find the servant who is "mainly employed in agricultural work"; then, if that servant happens to do something else, it may be domestic work, he is to get compensation for injury received in any work in which he is employed. The domestic servant who was not "mainly employed in agricultural work" would not be brought within the scope of the Bill. I agree that you have to make some division, and the dividing line is indicated by those words, "mainly employed in agricultural work."

LORD BURGHCLERE: There is an anomaly which is very patent on a little consideration of this sub-section. To follow out the argument of my noble friend a little further, we see at line 24—

"The expression 'agriculture' includes horticulture."

I will put a concrete case. "Horticulture," I suppose, would cover gardeners. In many establishments the gardener sometimes does work in the stable. By the preceding clause it is obvious that if the man is employed partly or occasionally in other work he also receives compensation. Therefore, employed in the stable, he will receive compensation if he is kicked by a horse. But, then, this anomaly will occur. There may be a coachman or a helper in that stable, and, as the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition has pointed out, by the original Act domestic servants are exempted from compensation. Domestic servants include coachmen and grooms. Therefore, the coachman who is doing work in the stable and who is kicked by a horse, would not get compensation, whereas the gardener who is there only for casual work, and is kicked by the same horse, would get compensation.

LORD ALVERSTONE: No one is more conscious of the anomaly than I am, but, to get over it, the noble Lord must move a clause extending the Bill to domestic servants. As long as you break up the servants into classes, then the class you are proposing to make the Bill apply to are to be those "mainly employed in agricultural work." The anomaly simply arises from the fact that you bring your gardener within the scope of the Bill, and not the coachman. The only way to get rid of the anomaly is to extend the Bill.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I do not quite follow that. The anomaly is created by this Bill.

LORD ALVERSTONE: Certainly.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Then what is the necessity for the clause? If a man is employed in agricultural work, when he meets with an accident in the course of that employment he will be entitled to compensation; but where is the necessity for extending that to the case of other work? It seems to me to be the gratuitous creation of what I think to be a most absurd anomaly—an anomaly which will not exist if this quite unnecessary clause is not put into the Bill. A man when he is employed in agricultural work will undoubtedly by the Bill be entitled to compensation; why should it be necessary, because he happens to be employed in agricultural work, to give him an additional privilege? There is no difficulty in getting rid of the anomaly by the simple method of striking out the words altogether.

LORD ALVERSTONE: I quite appreciate the anomaly to which attention is called, but the difficulty we had was this. We tried—I am speaking of those who then were discussing the Bill—to get rid of litigation as far as we could; and this difficulty was pointed out. Take the gardener, who prima facie comes under the Bill. Suppose he happens to be employed for an hour or so in doing some work which is not gardening, and meets with an accident. You would have immediately a controversy in the law courts as to whether or not he met with the injury in the course of doing one piece of work or another; and it was thought to be better that the man who came within the scope of the Bill should be within it for all the work that he did. I am not justifying the anomaly; but that was considered to be the best way of getting over the difficulty. It was thought better to distinguish between the classes of workmen, rather than between the classes of work.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government of Japan have received the mandate of all the Powers to undertake the relief, if possible, of the Legations and the suppression of the disturbances in Northern China, and have accepted the proposal.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): The Government of Japan have received assurances from Her Majesty's Government that the prompt despatch by them of a large force to Ta-ku would be welcomed by us; that no objection has been raised by any European Power to this course. Negotiations are still proceeding, and I am not in a position to make a further statement.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): Am I right in assuming the right hon. Gentleman to mean that the request to Japan was unanimous on the part of the Powers?

[No answer was returned.]

RECENT NEWS.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Has the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs any information about China?

*MR. BRODRICK: No, Sir. I am afraid we have nothing to add to the news already in the possession of the House.

PAPERS ON CHINA.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Papers respecting the affairs in China, in continuation of those issued in March, and bringing information up to the date of recent events, will be laid before Parliament; and how soon this will be done.

*MR. BRODRICK: Papers will be prepared as soon as possible.

NAVAL OFFICERS AND FOREIGN LANGUAGES.

SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state how many officers borne on the books of Her Majesty's ships on the China station can speak any language other than English; and can he give the number of those on the station who have qualified as interpreters in Russian, French, or German respectively.

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, Worcestershire, E.): Of the officers borne on the ships on the China station there are three qualified as interpreters in French, two in German, and one in Russian. As to how many more officers may possess a knowledge of languages other than their own I cannot say. We have no complete Returns on the subject. We know of twelve said to speak French and two German.

SIR J. COLOMB: To what branch of the Navy does the Russian interpreter belong?

MR. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN: I must ask for notice of any further question.

SUGGESTED NEGOTIATIONS FOR PEACE IN SOUTH AFRICA IN VIEW OF CHINESE COMPLICATIONS.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is impossible to get the information at the present moment.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: Can we not have it down to the end of last year?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If the hon. Gentleman will put that question down I will inquire.

COURT-MARTIAL ADMINISTRATION.

The following question appeared on the Paper:—

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: To ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether two persons, named Van der Valt and Boogsen, were recently tried and convicted by a court-martial at Colesberg, in Cape Colony; could he state to the House with what offence or offences they were charged, what were the sentences imposed by the court-martial, and did the Attorney General of the colony report against the justice of the conviction in either or both of these cases; have the sentences been since reduced, and by what authority and on what grounds; and can he say whether military tribunals are still taking cognisance of offences against the criminal law of the colony, notwithstanding that the ordinary courts of the country are and have for some time been open.

When called upon by the SPEAKER to put the question—

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN said: I have received a request from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies that I should address this question to the Under Secretary for War, but, with every possible respect for that hon. Gentleman, I must decline to do so, because I regard the Secretary of State for the Colonies as the proper guardian of the civil rights of Her Majesty's subjects in the Cape Colony. I shall therefore repeat the question, with all respect, on Monday.

IMPERIAL YEOMANRY PRISONERS WITH THE BOERS.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has or can procure the names of the men, as well as officers, of the 13th Imperial Yeomanry and other corps who are prisoners of war at Nooitgedacht, and information as to their food, shelter, and clothing, and as to any sick and wounded among them, also whether he has any information as to the effect of the place of their imprisonment and treatment on their health and life.
